Summary Paragraph

Development in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, which is located approximately five miles west of Washington, D.C., began wholeheartedly in 1890 and continued steadily until the late 1950s/early 1960s with the subdivision and resubdivision of several large parcels by multiple developers and speculative builders. The first subdivision of Fostoria (1890), later known as Highland Park, was located to the southeast of 18th Street North. The adjacent subdivisions of Over-Lee Knolls (1926) and Section Two Over-Lee Knolls (1927) were oriented to the north of Washington Boulevard, the primary road traveling through the neighborhood today. Additional subdivisions platted between 1929 and 1947 expanded the neighborhood to its current boundaries of 22nd Street North on the north, North Lexington Street and McKinley Road on the east, Interstate 66 (I-66) on the south, and North Quantico Street on the west. The slow initial development was accelerated as World Wars I and II ushered in an unprecedented need for housing in and surrounding the nation's capital. After World War II, the subdivisions, additions, and resubdivisions of Richmond Hill Section Three (1946), Richmond Hill Section Four (1947) and Highland Park Village (1947) were created on the last of the unimproved tracts of land. Resubdivision, albeit minor, occurred on a few of the larger lots as late as 2002, creating two or three building lots from one. Because development extended from about 1890 until the late twentieth century, the amalgamated neighborhood of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls is home to a variety of architectural styles, forms, and building types, the majority being domestic single-family buildings. Architectural styles include the Queen Anne and Italianate styles from the late nineteenth century when Fostoria was first platted, and Colonial Revival, Craftsman, Tudor Revival, and Modern Movement styles, which illustrate the development of the neighborhood in the twentieth century. The late-nineteenth- and early-twentieth-century buildings are vernacular interpretations of the fashionable styles popular throughout the nation at the time of their construction. This reflects the influence of individual property owners and architects over the designs, economics of the period, and the lack of most amenities that would have attracted prospective residents. The more modest development in the mid-twentieth century reflects the solid middle-class nature of the commuter suburb Highland Park-Overlee Knolls with the dominance of the automobile, as well as the tremendous need for housing and the speculative development successfully undertaken by builders and developers. The standards and guidelines of the Federal Housing Administration (FHA) and its many divisions, as well as the efforts of the Better Homes movement, were implemented throughout the neighborhood, often even if the development lacked government-insured funding. Typical forms from this second period of development include the bungalow, American Foursquare, Cape Cod, ranch house, and split-level. Building types include freestanding and twin single-family dwellings, commercial buildings, a church, and former school. Additionally, there are secondary resources such as garages, carports, and sheds that add to the architectural landscape and historic context. Landscaped parks located along the southern border and through the approximate center unite the neighborhood. The amalgamated neighborhood of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, extending beyond the boundaries of the local civic association to convey the development context and subsequent growth of eight subdivisions, additions, and resubdivisions, today contains approximately 718 properties.

Narrative Description

Site Description

Highland Park-Overlee Knolls is a residential neighborhood comprised of 180.7 acres in northwest Arlington County, set approximately 400 feet above sea level. The community is bounded on the north by 22nd Street North, on the east by North Lexington Street, 16th Street North, North Longfellow Street, and McKinley Road, and on the west by North Quantico Street. Interstate 66 (I-66) physically bounds the neighborhood to the south. The lots vary in size, with the standard parcel measuring approximately fifty feet by one hundred feet. The domestic buildings have a consistent suburban set back, often but not consistently with sidewalks buffering them from the paved public roads. The streets are irregularly planned, with many creating triangular or semicircular residential blocks and landscaped medians. Approximately half of the streets, primarily those along the major transportation corridors and in the northeastern corner of the neighborhood, have concrete curbing. Many properties incorporate driveways and have contemporaneous freestanding garages located behind the primary resources.

There are several parks and bicycle paths in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls. Consisting of 3.5 acres, Parkhurst Park was established in 1939 around the cul-de-sac of 20th Road North, south of North Lexington Street. Ayres Playground, consisting of 10.7 acres, is associated with the former Walter Reed School on McKinley Road. John Marshall Greenway is located along the right-of-way of North Ohio Street between Washington Boulevard and 22nd Street North (it continues northward to Lee Highway). A paved bicycle path runs parallel to the greenway. A large landscaped median is located at the intersection of 21st Street North and North Potomac Street, north of Washington Boulevard. Another paved bicycle path runs parallel to the northern sound wall of I-66 between McKinley Road and North Quantico Street. This path is accessible via McKinley Road, North Ohio Street, North Potomac Street, and North Quantico Street.

Architectural Description

Fostoria: 1890-1900

The buildings in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls collectively display architectural elements that reflect the neighborhood's entire period of development from the late nineteenth century to the mid- and late twentieth century. The oldest extant buildings date from the 1890s; the Washington/Torreyson Farm House has a likely construction period of 1879 to 1905. The form of the buildings from this period, which are all located in the initial subdivision of Fostoria (now Highland Park), are ornate, detailed with Queen Anne-style elements such as three-sided projecting bays, sawn or turned balusters, ogee-molded cornice returns and a plain wide frieze, often with bed molding, and chamfered or turned posts with scrolled brackets. The high-style Barnard and Fanny Noland House at 1506 North Nicholas Street (ca. 1890) is an excellent illustration of the Queen Anne style from the neighborhood's initial development period, featuring a cross-gabled roof with an L-shaped plan, a three-story tower, and a wrap-around porch. The two-and-a-half-story single dwelling is constructed of wood frame reclad with asbestos siding. The building is heated by an interior-end brick chimney with an ornately corbeled cap. The overhanging eaves are finished with a narrow frieze, cornice returns, and a raking cornice. The tops of the gable ends are clad with fish-scale wood shingles. A one-story, wrap-around porch has turned wood posts with scrolled brackets and turned balusters. The pyramidal-roofed tower is asymmetrically located on the façade. The third story of the tower is clad in square-butt wood shingles. This imposing high-style dwelling has 1/1, double-hung, wood-sash windows with square-edged wood surrounds and a modest single-leaf entry with a paneled wood door topped by a one-light transom.

Stretching across two lots is the Rachal Maynard House at 5915 15th Street North. It was constructed in 1906 by local builder and Fostoria resident Bernard Noland, who was responsible for the construction of numerous Queen Anne-style houses in the area at the turn of the twentieth century. The Rachal Maynard House is one of the largest freestanding single-family dwellings in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls and is prominently set on a rise at the center of 15th Street North in Fostoria. This impressive Queen Anne-style wood-frame structure rises two-and-a-half stories in height, on a raised foundation. Rectangular in form, the house is covered by an imposing clipped gable roof with expansive overhanging eaves, wide frieze with panels, ogee-molded architrave and bed molding, and paneled soffits. It is covered in weatherboard siding on the first story and staggered wood shingles on the upper stories. Noland's distinctive wrap-around porch has paired Tuscan posts set on a paneled plinth and square balusters. The roof of the porch is encircled by rectangular paneled plinths and square balusters. The asymmetrical fenestration included 1/1, double-hung and one-light casement windows, elongated jack-arched openings on the first story, semicircular-arched openings piercing the oriel windows, a large fixed oval window, and wide single- and double-leaf entry openings. A clipped front gable projects from the center of the roof, creating an internal dormer finished with staggered wood shingles, square balusters, solid bargeboard, and a Palladian window.

The Washington/Torreyson Farm House at 1600 North Lexington Street is a vernacular I-house, sited on a high knoll overlooking Highland Park-Overlee Knolls. The construction date, based on historic documentation, occurred sometime between 1879 and 1905. The two-story house is wood frame, now clad in Hardiplank siding. Set on a continuous fieldstone foundation, the house is covered by a side-gabled roof of standing-seam metal. The symmetrical fenestration of the façade is created by 6/6, double-hung, wood-sash windows and six-light casement windows of wood. A one-bay-wide front porch, reconstructed in 2007 to replace a circa 1940s porch, features chamfered wood columns and pilasters, a simple wood balustrade, and turned balusters. The house has undergone two distinct renovations since its initial construction, the first in the 1940s and the most substantial in 2007; however, the original main block remains intact.

Fostoria, Over-Lee Knolls, and Section Two Over-Lee Knolls Subdivisions: 1900-1927

More modest examples from the turn of the twentieth century, located in Fostoria along North McKinley Street and 14th Street North, stand two-and-a-half stories in height and three bays wide with gable roofs. The majority of the examples, such as those at 1329 and 1339 McKinley Road, are wood-frame buildings clad in German wood siding with corner boards; a few examples have been reclad in vinyl siding. The porches, both full-width and wrapping, have turned wood posts with scrolled brackets. One example has been altered by the addition of a Craftsman-style porch with tapered wood posts set on concrete-block piers. The modest buildings are pierced by 1/1, double-hung windows and single-leaf doors, typically with ornate surrounds indicative of the Queen Anne style.

Between 1900 and 1927, a substantial number of Colonial Revival-style dwellings were constructed in the Fostoria, Over-Lee Knolls, and Section Two Over-Lee Knolls subdivisions. The single dwelling at 1321 McKinley Road is an excellent high-style example of early-twentieth-century Colonial Revival-style architecture as presented in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls. Built circa 1915 in the Fostoria subdivision, the two-story, three-bay building features a side-gabled main block augmented by a two-story, front-gabled porch supported by Tuscan wood columns. The masonry building is constructed of stretcher-bond bricks with an exterior-end, shouldered chimney. The window openings have 6/6, double-hung, wood sash with rowlock sills. The single-leaf entry features a Colonial Revival-style surround with pilasters and a broken pediment. A more modest example of the Colonial Revival style, which is representative of the style in the late 1920s and early 1930s, is located at 6018 20th Street North in the Section Two Over-Lee Knolls subdivision. Constructed circa 1925, this brick dwelling stands two stories in height with a side-gabled roof. The window openings have 6/6, double-hung sash with rowlock sills and jack arches composed of soldier bricks. A one-story, one-bay porch shelters the single-leaf, paneled wood door. The porch has a front-gabled roof with denticulated pediment, which is supported by wood Tuscan columns.

There are several dwellings dating from the 1920s and 1930s that illustrate Craftsman-style detailing on the traditional bungalow, a domestic form that is not commonly found in this neighborhood. The distinctive style and low-lying form were typically constructed individually by new property owners or by “home builders” as speculative investments. The dwelling at 6226 21st Street North, constructed circa 1935, is an excellent representative of Craftsman style and bungalow form as it was illustrated in Overlee Knolls. Set on a concrete-block foundation clad in stucco, this one-and-a-half-story house is constructed of wood frame that has been reclad in asbestos shingles. The side-gabled roof has overhanging eaves with exposed rafter ends and wood brackets. The one-story, one-bay entry porch is covered by a front-gabled roof that is supported by Tuscan wood posts. Fenestration consists of 6/6, double-hung windows and triple casement windows with a single light.

Highland Park-Overlee Knolls: Traditional Forms and Styles of the 1920s to the 1950s

Highland Park-Overlee Knolls experienced rapid growth during both of the post-war periods, specifically from the 1920s to the 1950s. New development, which included the platting of Parkhurst in 1938 and Over Lee Ridge in 1940, integrated many of the small house and neighborhood planning fundamentals promoted by the Federal Housing Administration (FHA). The resulting residential architecture in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls has little or no applied ornamentation, and consists largely of masonry buildings with rectangular forms and mass-produced building materials introduced and/or improved upon during World War II (1941-1945). By the second quarter of the twentieth century, the modest Cape Cod, two-story rectangular box and the pyramidal-capped square box were the common domestic building forms in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls. Many of the buildings from this period have Colonial Revival- or Tudor Revival-style elements that are modestly applied. The first buildings in the neighborhood, especially those in Fostoria, were constructed of wood frame, but by the second quarter of the twentieth century, the buildings were constructed of concrete blocks faced in bricks and/or a variety of new materials, like those promoted by the FHA. Asbestos siding, aluminum siding, bricktex, formstone, and pre-stressed concrete replaced traditional exterior materials such as weatherboard siding, vertical-beaded board, wood shingles, asbestos-cement shingles, and ornamental concrete blocks. This is evident in Over Lee Ridge, for example, where construction began in 1940 soon after the area was platted. The single-family dwellings in this subdivision were predominately erected by four builders, thus ensuring similarity in form and style, as well as materials. The house at 6204 18th Street North, for example, is a two-story structure of concrete blocks with brick facing. The main block, extending two bays wide and two bays deep, has a side-gabled roof with corbeled cornice, shallow overhang, and exterior-end brick chimney. The primary entry opening holds a six-light, paneled wood door with Colonial Revival surrounds, wide frieze with architrave cornice, and inoperable louvered shutters. The three-sided bay window on the first story has a half-hipped roof and wide Tuscan pilasters that act as mullions. The frieze of the bay window has a scalloped motif. The central opening holds a twelve-light, fixed window flanked by 6/6, double-hung, wood-sash windows. The second story, marked by a projecting brick string course, has symmetrically placed 6/6, double-hung, wood-sash windows with inoperable louvered shutters. The side elevations of the building are veneered on the first story with brick, while the second story, as a means of reducing the cost of construction and materials, is clad in synthetic siding. The modest size of the dwelling, constructed by Colin C. MacPherson in 1942, is augmented by a one-story wing on the side elevation. The simplified form of the building and limited ornamentation, which became commonplace in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, ensured low construction costs, which was essential during a period when many building materials were scarce and home ownership was a substantial investment for those with a middle-class budget.

The house at 1601 North Nicholas Street is another representative example of the Colonial Revival style from the mid-twentieth century as it was commonly presented in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls. Constructed in 1949, the house is one of several buildings erected by Snell Construction Company in the neighborhood that apply the Colonial Revival style to the traditional suburban form of a two-story rectangular box with one-story wings. Set on a solid foundation, the house is three bays wide, capped with a side-gabled roof of asphalt shingles. The masonry structure is veneered in six-course, Flemish-bond brick. Fenestration includes 6/6, double-hung windows that are also incorporated in a first-story bay window, and a single-leaf wood paneled door with lights. The centrally placed entry has a Colonial Revival-style surround with fluted pilasters and broken pediment. An exterior-end brick chimney rises from the side elevation. One-story wings, original to the design, project from the north and south (side) elevations. Like the main block, the wings are veneered in six-course, Flemish-bond brick and covered by side-gabled roofs of asphalt shingles. This popular, and thus common, domestic form with Colonial Revival-style detailing continued to be erected throughout Highland Park-Overlee Knolls and Arlington County throughout the 1950s.

In the Parkhurst Subdivision, there are fifty-one extant dwellings that are notably similar in form, style, and materials. All of the buildings were constructed by the Parkhurst Development Company between 1938 and 1940 following many of the ideals presented by the FHA. Located on North Madison Street and 21st Street North, the various subdivisions making up Parkhurst incorporate a landscape park that visually and physically acts to enlarge the individual lots and create a secluded, non-urban setting. The buildings are nearly identical, standing one-and-a-half stories in height with Colonial Revival-style detailing applied to a Cape Cod form. The house at 5828 21st Street North is a good illustration of the Cape Cod buildings in Parkhurst and throughout Highland Park-Overlee Knolls. Rising one-and-a-half stories in height, the wood-frame building is clad in vinyl siding, applied over the original asbestos-cement shingles. The building, three bays wide with a central entry, has a side-gabled roof of asphalt shingles. The roof is pierced by two front-gabled dormers with 6/6, double-hung, wood-sash windows. A large brick chimney, painted white, rises from the gable end. The single-leaf entry opening holds a wood-frame door with panels set under four fixed lights. The flanking window openings have 6/6, double-hung, wood sash with square-edged surrounds and wood sills. Other examples of this form and stylistic ornamentation are located in the original subdivision of Fostoria, especially along 18th Street North and North Powhatan Street (south of 18th Street North). These modest dwellings date from the early to mid-1940s and early 1950s, reflecting the tremendous need for housing prior to and following World War II.

The dwelling at 5906 22nd Street North, which is located in Section Two Over-Lee Knolls (this section was resubdivided in 1940 as Parkhurst Subdivision 3), presents the popular two-story rectangular box form augmented by a projecting entry bay that, because of its form and material finishes, provides individuality and architectural style. Dating from circa 1927, the two-story masonry structure is concrete blocks veneered in bricks laid in a five-course American-bond pattern and covered by a side-gabled roof. The Tudor Revival style is illustrated on the entry bay in the end bay. This projecting bay is veneered in skintled brick and covered by a steeply pitched roof that slopes on the east side. The upper gable end, presumably constructed of wood frame, is covered with stucco and half-timbering of wood. The slope of the roof extends beyond the plane of the wall and is pierced by a semicircular-arched entry opening that leads to the side yard and driveway. The main block of the dwelling has single and paired 6/6, double-hung sash windows with rowlock sills and inoperable paneled shutters. The first story of the main block is sheltered by a front-gabled porch, which according to the Sanborn Fire Insurance Maps of 1936 and 1959, is an original feature. The porch is stylistically in keeping with the dwelling as originally constructed with half-timbering in the gable end, metal balustrade, and Tuscan wood posts. The neighboring house at 5904 22nd Street North is similar in form, materials, style, and fenestration. Collectively these two buildings exhibit the work of a home builder who, although interested more in the sale of vacant, unimproved lots, occasionally constructed modest, economical housing to attract prospective residents to the area. Although reflecting a popular architectural style, the Tudor Revival houses were not commonly constructed in groups as was commonly the case with Colonial Revival-style Cape Cods and the two-story rectangular box.

A singular example of the Tudor Revival style is found at 6021 16th Street North in the Fostoria subdivision, which was then known as Highland Park. Constructed in 1951 by real estate investor Alfred T. Vest, this one-and-a-half-story, four-bay single dwelling has a rectangular plan set on a solid foundation faced in brick. The masonry structure of five-course Flemish-bond bricks has an exterior-front brick chimney with stuccoed double stacks and corbeled caps. The hipped roof is covered in asphalt shingles, features overhanging eaves, and has a plain frieze. The façade (south elevation) and west (side) elevation have projecting front-gabled bays that are covered in stucco and half-timbering. The building is fenestrated with triple ten-light and eight-light vinyl casement windows; paired six-light vinyl casement windows; paired one-light sliding windows; and a multi-light canted bay window. All windows have rowlock sills and narrow wood surrounds. A single-leaf, paneled wood door with lights pierces the façade. Although typical in form, materials, architectural style, and fenestration to many contemporaneous Tudor Revival-style dwellings in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, this building is notably larger in massing, which is principally the result of its siting on an expansive triangular-shaped lot at the intersection of 16th Street North with 18th Street North. Because the building actually fronts both streets, Tudor Revival-style ornamentation is not merely relegated to the façade, which was commonly the practice for economical reasons.

Highland Park-Overlee Knolls: Modern Movement of the 1950s-1960s

The last phase in residential construction in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls consisted of buildings reflecting the styles and forms popular during the Modern Movement following World War II. The form and style used for modern buildings abandoned historical precedent, had limited or eliminated ornamentation, and used organic and naturalistic construction materials. Identified forms include the ranch house, split-level, and what several builders termed “California-type houses.” Asbestos siding, aluminum siding, bricktex, form stone, and pre-stressed concrete replaced traditional exterior materials such as weatherboard siding, vertical beaded board, wood shingles, asbestos-cement shingles, and ornamental concrete blocks.

The modest dwelling at 6244 18th Road North is a representative example of the Modern Movement’s modest recognizable domestic form—the ranch house. Created as a developer house, the ranch house originated in California in the 1930s and quickly became the prevailing domestic house form, signifying the prosperity associated with private land ownership while being economical because of its modest size. As presented by Snell Construction Company in 1950, the house at 6244 18th Road North is one story in height and asymmetrically fenestrated across the façade. This concrete-block dwelling is veneered in six-course, Flemish-bond bricks with a large brick chimney rising from the side elevation. The low-lying side-gabled roof, a dominating feature that enforces the horizontality of the ranch house, is covered in asphalt shingles. Unlike the popular bungalow and Cape Cod forms, the roof is devoid of dormers, further emphasizing horizontality. Fenestration consists of one-light, wood casement and fixed windows with brick rowlock sills. These window types combine on the façade to create two large picture windows, a feature of nearly all mid-twentieth-century housing to falsely enlarge the interiors by providing unobstructed exterior views. The single-leaf, paneled wood door in the center bay is ornamented with a Colonial Revival-style surround of engaged fluted pilasters. The inoperable louvered shutters framing the picture windows, molded wood entry surround, and the Flemish-bond brick veneer are clear attempts to recall traditional architectural styles utilized throughout the neighborhood that most prospective homeowners recognized and desired in the years following World War II. As the dwelling at 6244 18th Road North illustrates, the ranch houses in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls introduce a new housing type that was synonymous with the changing ideals of the mid-twentieth century, while attempting to gain public acceptance with traditional building materials and stylistic ornamentation.

The ranch house form was commonly modified to meet the economic needs and existing topography of the locality in which it was being constructed. Three houses in a resubdivided section of Overlee Knolls reflect the adaptation of the ranch house by the construction firm of Zirkle & Mason in 1955. Located at 2207-2211-2215 North Nottingham Street, these houses are rectangular in form, lying low to the ground with the horizontal emphasis common to the ranch house. The buildings are economically constructed within inexpensive materials such as concrete blocks faced in a brick veneer. The low-lying side-gabled roofs are finished with asphalt shingles and have overhanging eaves with rake boards in the upper gable ends and the suggestion of cornice returns. Large exterior-end chimneys covered in brick project from the north side elevations of each building. Indicative of the period and this particular domestic form, the picture windows consist of a large center fixed pane flanked by narrower operable sash. The window opening illuminates the public living space, while the private rooms to the south of the main entry have smaller openings. However, unlike many contemporary examples, these smaller openings are larger than the traditional single sash, holding paired sliding windows; one example has replacement casement windows. The main entries, although located at the approximate center of the facades, appear to be recessed because of the slight projection of the southernmost two bays. The dwellings lack applied ornamentation such as cornice molding, sidelights, lintels, and corbeled chimney caps. Rather, the ornamentation is provided by the modest brick veneer that is laid in a six-course, Flemish-bond pattern and the fenestration, which unites the small interior spaces with landscaped yards marked by mature trees. The existing topography, which was unaltered most likely because of financial reasons, has greatly affected the design of the houses. As North Nottingham Street slopes upward from 22nd Street North, the grade allows for the inclusion of a below-grade garage at 2207 North Nottingham Street. The lots on which 2211 and 2215 North Nottingham Street were constructed are level; thus, a below-grade garage was not economically favorable and would have greatly affected the construction price, and thus the sale price of the house. The inclusion of the garage is the only alteration to the standardized design plan utilized by Zirkle & Mason Construction in their interpretation of the ranch house form.

A contemporaneous house, which was built by the construction firm of Brown & Westfall in 1955, is located at 6016 19th Street North in Section Two of Over-Lee Knolls. Incorporating many elements embraced by the ranch house, the main block of the one-story dwelling stands a full story on its eastern side, thus presenting a split-level form. The concrete-block structure is veneered in five-course Flemish-bond bricks. Like the ranch houses on North Nottingham Street, the dwelling has a large fixed picture window with smaller flanking operable sash illuminating the public living space, which is open to the main entry vestibule on the interior. The bedrooms, bath, and family room are located in the two-story block, which is pierced by single double-hung sash that limits visibility from the exterior to these private rooms. A similar example, dating from 1960, is located at 2100 North Ohio Street. This split-level house has been dressed to reflect the Colonial Revival style, with sidelights framing the main entry, enclosed tympanum with round window, and projecting oriel window merging the interior with the landscaped yard. Additionally, the existing topography allowed for a below-grade garage under the one-story main block. The split-level form, although nationally popular, was not overwhelmingly accepted by builders and prospective residents of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls. Rather, it was replaced in the late 1960s and early 1970s by the split-foyer, which also was not commonly constructed primarily because much of the area had already been developed by the time this domestic form became favored nationally.

One of the more interesting building forms identified from this last phase of development is a modest square structure capped by a pyramidal roof. This form, indicative of the Modern Movement, was identified by various builders working throughout northern Arlington County as the "California-type house." It is easily identified by its distinctive roofline, double-shouldered exterior brick chimney rising from the façade, deeply recessed main entry, and window openings pushed to the outermost bays, sometimes wrapping around the corners. An advertisement in the Washington Post describes the interior of the building:

This California-type house continues to meet with public approval. All of the rooms are large and on the one floor. We have a beautiful foyer entrance and center hall. Extra large living room has wood-burning fireplace, 2 twin-sized bedrooms with delightful cross ventilation.¹

The three noted examples of the California-type house, identical in form, design, and materials, were constructed in the Over-Lee Knolls subdivision fronting 22nd Street North. The modest single-family dwellings are one story in height, constructed of concrete blocks faced in stucco. The pyramidal roofs have wide overhanging eaves with narrow square-edged cornices. Each of the unadorned facades is dominated by a large exterior brick chimney with double shoulders and a corbelled cap. The stack of the chimney protrudes through the overhanging eave to read as an interior chimney above the roofline. The chimney is asymmetrically placed to the side of the deeply recessed main entry, which holds a single-leaf paneled door. A small window opening, illuminating the entry vestibule, is located between the chimney and entry. The wide window openings originally held metal casement windows, the majority of which have been replaced by vinyl casement or double-hung sash. These triple window openings are located in the outermost bays of the elevations. The three examples are located at 5825 22nd Street North (1948), 5829 22nd Street North (1949), and 5836 22nd Street North (1949), all constructed by naval commander and lawyer John H. Gullett as speculative development.

Educational Facilities

The former Walter Reed Elementary School at 1644 McKinley Road is located on 10.7 acres of land, originally part of the Febrey farmland. Walter Reed School was constructed as a four-room school in 1938, and expanded in 1946, 1950, 1962, and 1967 to meet the burgeoning student population. The two-story school extends eleven bays wide and one bay deep with minimal fenestration on the side elevations. Reflecting the Classical Revival style, the rectangular school building is clad in three-course, Flemish-bond brick with brick quoins, concrete lug sills, wood cornice with ovolo profile, metal coping on the parapet wall hiding the flat roof and interior chimney, and concrete panel over the slightly projecting three central bays of the façade that reads “Walter Reed Elementary School.” The distinct fenestration includes large semi-circular windows of multiple lights with wide mullions; paired window openings rising nearly the full height of each story with multiple lights set over hopper windows; and a full-height central entry opening with double-leaf wood doors topped by a large semi-circular window. In 1982, the school was closed and students were relocated to a neighboring school that was losing enrollment. The building has recently undergone an extensive renovation, now housing the Westover Branch of the Arlington County Public Library.

Commercial Buildings

Commercial buildings are confined to Washington Boulevard, serving both the Highland Park-Overlee Knolls and Westover neighborhoods. The construction of the commercial buildings was largely in response to the development of Westover, a planned residential subdivision that was developed between 1939 and 1948 by Mace Properties and E. Ray Keene. The restriction of commercial development and community facilities to Washington Boulevard, the major thoroughfare through the area, illustrates FHA design standards for community planning. The neighborhood center, ensuring self-sufficiency, aided in the control of private commercial development by implementing land-use policies “that restricted commercial outlets to a single-relatively small area.”² Despite FHA’s efforts to prevent strip retail development beyond the neighborhood center, in many instances outside developers constructed additional retail buildings in close proximity to the existing shopping centers. The developers’ strategy was based on the idea that new businesses, and therefore the developers as well, would benefit from the established commercial businesses. This resulted in the construction of commercial buildings on the south side of Washington Boulevard. Contemporaneous to Westover Shopping Center, which was constructed in phases between 1940 and 1950, the two-story building at 5900-5904 Washington Boulevard originally contained three commercial storefronts, erected in 1941 by John O. Kines. Set at the corner of Washington Boulevard and McKinley Road, the Rice Building was constructed for James Rice. Rehabilitation of the original portion of the building has resulted in the loss of the individual storefronts. The masonry building is now covered in dryvit on the first story (a common alteration for commercial buildings) and veneered in six-course American-bond brick on the second story of the primary elevations. A string course of rowlock bricks that acts as a continuous sill runs between the first and second stories; it is largely hidden by the dryvit and lighting boxes. A knee wall of terrazzo has been applied to the primary elevations along Washington Boulevard and McKinley Road. An exterior brick chimney rises from the side elevation of the building, which is covered by a flat roof with metal coping. The building is fenestrated with one-light, fixed metal-framed store windows and paired one-light sliding windows on the second story. Exceptionally narrow 1/1, double-hung, metal-sash windows mark the western end bays on the second story. Fixed one-light windows in metal frames, both rectangular and round, are located on the primary elevation along McKinley Road. The canted corner of the building allows for the primary entry to the restaurant that now occupies the two easternmost stores. The westernmost store has a recessed canted entry created by plate glass windows with narrow metal frames. The three single-leaf entry openings have wood-frame commercial doors.

Four storefronts in a one-story building were constructed in 1948 at 5908-5912 Washington Boulevard by Biron & Biron for a Mr. Stiner. The topography of the site allows each of the four storefronts to read individually as the building steps upward from east to west on Washington Boulevard. Each storefront is two bays wide, including a recessed half-canted entry. Constructed of masonry, the building is veneered in five-course Flemish-bond brick, with an exterior-rear chimney rising from the south elevation. The flat roof is obscured by a parapet with a concrete cap. Brickwork on the parapet projects slightly to mimic modillions. Each storefront has metal-framed plate glass windows and wood-frame commercial doors. One-light transoms with hopper windows are located over the entry opening.

Religious Facility: Church

One of the most inspiring Modern Movement buildings in Arlington County is the Resurrection Evangelical Lutheran Church at 6201 Washington Boulevard. The original open-nave church was constructed in 1941 with a front-gabled roof facing Washington Boulevard. Beginning in 1958, a large one-story addition was constructed on the west side of the original 1941 structure, which was subsequently razed to allow the building to expand further. The rectangular 1958 structure has an open nave plan with a projecting bay on the east elevation (presumably the altar) and two-story educational facility on the west elevation. The new building is constructed of concrete blocks faced in six-course, American-bond brick with a molded stone water table. A steeply pitched side-gabled roof has a raked cornice, returns, a plain frieze board, and an ogee-profiled cornice. The projecting bay on the east elevation has a side-gabled roof that is steeply pitched, yet lower than that of the main sanctuary. The educational facility has a flat roof with metal cornice. There are two exterior-side chimneys constructed of brick located in the northwest corner of the building. Indicative of the Modern Movement, the main entry fronting Washington Boulevard is a two-story projecting bay with a flat roof and brick-veneered side walls. The façade of the entry bay is composed of plate glass set in narrow metal frames. The double-leaf entry has commercial-style doors with sidelights. A tall bell tower veneered in brick rises from the west side of the main entry. The top of the tower is metal frame with three openings, each holding a bell. The top of the structure is crowned by a metal spire. The main sanctuary has 2/2 and 4/4, double-hung, metal-sash windows with stained-glass panels. The windows, grouped in pairs, have stuccoed spandrels. Large window openings covered by metal lattice mark the north and south elevations of the projecting bay on the east elevation. This bay also has small square window openings with fixed and sliding glass windows. A large cross filled with stained glass pierces the upper gable end of the east elevation.

The two-story educational facility, which also contains the church offices, was completed in 1959 on the site of the original 1941 church. Constructed of concrete blocks veneered in six-course, American-bond brick, the educational facility has a design that is reminiscent of schools dating from the mid-twentieth century. The south, west, and east elevations have banked windows with metal spandrels and wide mullions that rise the full height of the building. The openings have one-light fixed windows with a one-light transom at the top and one-light hopper window at the base. The southern end of the west elevation is ornamented with pierced concrete screens with a floral pattern. The L-shape of the building provides a recessed entry along North Potomac Street. The double-leaf commercial-style doors with wide one-light sidelights are sheltered by a cantilevered flat roof with metal coping. Symmetrically placed above is a triple opening with wide metal mullions framing one-light, plate glass windows.

Secondary Resources

The secondary resources in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls consist of garages, carports, storage sheds, barbecue pits, studios, guesthouses, and an office. Garages were typically constructed at the time or shortly after the houses were built, and reflect the same architectural design and details of the primary dwelling. Characteristically, the garages are one story in height and one bay in width with a concrete foundation, are of wood-frame construction, and have a front-gabled roof of asphalt shingles. The garages are generally located to the rear of the property, along a side elevation of the house, and are accessible by a paved driveway. Many of the garages have been reclad in vinyl or aluminum siding, while a small number exhibit the original weatherboard siding, asbestos shingles, or brick veneer. The garages are primarily fenestrated by multi-paneled, roll-up or double-leaf, strap-hinged wood vehicular doors.

Storage sheds in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls are also characteristically one story high, one bay wide, and constructed of wood frame. The buildings have gable or shed roofs with single- or double-leaf entry doors. A large number of wood and metal prefabricated storage sheds, located to the rear of the properties, support the primary resources in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls. A few dwellings feature attached and detached carports along the side of the building. The carports are generally covered by a flat roof supported by metal posts.

Integral elements in the design of the subdivisions, visually as well as socially, are the three planned parks and multiple bike paths that are centerpieces of the neighborhood. Parkhurst Park was established in 1939 when the subdivision of Parkhurst was platted along 20th and 21st Streets North. John Marshall Greenway located along the right-of-way of North Ohio Street north of the intersection with Washington Boulevard in Section Two of Over-Lee Knolls. The 21st Street North/North Potomac Street Park is located in the right-of-way at the intersection of those two streets in the original subdivision of Over-Lee Knolls. A bikeway runs along the Ohio Street right-of-way between 22nd Street North and Washington Boulevard, then runs parallel along the northern sound wall of I-66 between McKinley Road and North Quantico Street. This trail is accessible via McKinley Road, North Ohio Street, North Potomac Street, and North Quantico Street.³

Historic District Inventory Report

Highland Park-Overlee Knolls Historic District

In the following inventory, all resources have been considered either contributing or non-contributing based upon the areas of significance indicated under Criteria A and C under the themes of Architecture and/or Community Planning/Development, and based upon the period of significance that extends from circa 1879 through 1960. This period of significance was established through the archival research necessary to establish an historic context and the on-site survey that identified resources to support that context. Historic documentation (deeds and maps) coupled with on-site study have given the Washington/Torreyson Farm House a likely construction date of 1879 to 1905. Thus the period of significance for Highland Park-Overlee Knolls begins circa 1879 to capture the possible construction of this dwelling prior to the subdivision of Fostoria in 1890. The 1960 end date of the period of significance reflects the final development phase for the community, as well as the fifty-year mark used as a guideline by the National Park Service to develop historical perspective and to evaluate significance. Therefore, all non-contributing resources are either constructed before circa 1879 or after 1960. Additionally, although constructed within the period of significance, resources that do not retain sufficient integrity due to alterations and additions, and therefore cannot represent the period and areas of significance, have been deemed non-contributing.

Period of Significance (justification)

The period of significance for the Highland Park-Overlee Knolls Historic District reflects construction of the Washington/Torreyson Farm House circa 1879. It encompasses the platting of Fostoria in 1890 and its development with the eight subdivisions, additions, and resubdivisions of Highland Park and Overlee Knolls, which were all platted prior to 1947. The greatest period of construction/development ceased in 1960. Moreover, the few buildings constructed after 1960 do not represent the historic context of the historic district and introduce new building forms, modern synthetic materials, and modified architectural styles that are not consistent with those constructed between circa 1879 and 1960.

Statement of Significance Summary Paragraph (Provide a summary paragraph that includes level of significance and applicable criteria.)

The Highland Park-Overlee Knolls Historic District is significant as one of the finest residential commuter suburbs of Washington, D.C., reflecting the principles and practices of subdivision design and residential development from the late nineteenth century through to the mid-twentieth century. Located in western Arlington County, Virginia, the community was established upon the arrivals of the railroad and streetcar with the platting of Fostoria in 1890 and expanded during the first half of the twentieth century with the advent of commuter railways, buses, and automobiles. Highland Park-Overlee Knolls is an amalgamation of several subdivisions, additions, and resubdivisions, established and enhanced under the direction of subdividers, community builders, operative builders, and developers who expanded on the 1890 subdivision of Fostoria and embraced the fundamentals of the Federal Housing Administration (FHA) and nationally recognized organizations promoting to make “convenient, attractive and wholesome homes accessible to all American families.” The historic district provides one of the best illustrations in Arlington County of how the FHA’s principles for small houses and residential neighborhood planning and the Better Homes movement could foster residential development within the individual subdivisions of a neighborhood. This was largely the result of Arlington County’s close proximity to the nation’s capital where the FHA was located and the burgeoning need for quickly erected middle-income housing to sustain the suburban growth and development of the Washington metropolitan area. Further, Highland Park-Overlee Knolls is home to one of the county’s earliest FHA-insured subdivision developments – Parkhurst – which was constructed in three phases between 1938 and 1940. Unlike the planned neighborhoods of Arlington County that developed as cohesive communities such as neighboring Westover and Dominion Hills, Highland Park-Overlee Knolls was created by numerous independent subdividers, builders, and developers who benefited from the successes and failures of planned residential suburbs within the Washington metropolitan area and the nation. The result is the fusion of eight subdivisions into a unified neighborhood that incorporates education, religion, recreation, and shopping under the direction of one of Arlington County’s earliest civic associations, which was founded in the early 1930s. Architecturally, Highland Park-Overlee Knolls reflects the nationwide changes from the last quarter of the nineteenth century to the mid-twentieth century as residential building forms, styles, and materials reacted to significant events such as changes in public and private modes of transportation, the effects of both World Wars and thus the burgeoning military and federal government-employed populace of Arlington County, and the creation and evolution of FHA guidelines and the Better Homes movement. The neighborhood retains a significant and intact collection of single-family dwellings representing fashionable styles and forms including the Queen Anne, Craftsman/Bungalow, Cape Cod, Colonial Revival, and Tudor Revival, which stand in sync alongside the Modern Movement ranch house and Arlington County’s own “California-type” house, a term coined by a local speculative builder who observed domestic architecture while on the west coast. Thus, Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, developing from the late nineteenth century through to the platting of the last subdivision in 1947, allows for a comprehensive study of residential architecture and the necessary supporting amenities as they evolved to meet the changing demands of homeowners from the Victorian era through to the Modern Movement.

Highland Park-Overlee Knolls meets National Register criteria A and C, and is significant under the themes of architecture and community planning/development with the period of significance extending from circa 1879 to 1960. Highland Park-Overlee Knolls is being nominated under the Multiple Property Document, Historic Residential Suburbs in the United States, 1830-1960 (National Park Service, 2002). This locally significant neighborhood, the boundaries of which are based on historic plats and development patterns, possesses the distinctive features of the four subtypes of historic residential suburbs and meets the registration requirements outlined in that Multiple Property Document.

Narrative Statement of Significance (Provide at least one paragraph for each area of significance.)

Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, significant for its architecture and community planning/development, meets National Register criteria A and C:

Criterion A: That are associated with events that have made a significant contribution to the broad patterns of our history.

Highland Park-Overlee Knolls meets Criterion A of the National Register of Historic Places as a commuting suburb that was established upon the arrival of the railroad in northern Arlington County in the late nineteenth century and continued to expand as a middle-class suburban neighborhood serviced first by the electric streetcar and then the automobile in the twentieth century. Success of residential suburbs like Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, which was located in the largely undeveloped western portion of the county, were due in large part to the availability of modern amenities and accessibility to public transportation and roads. Adapted by the Federal Housing Administration (FHA) in the mid-1930s, these fundamentals were clearly understood by the first developers of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, who intentionally established their subdivisions and additions around a station stop of the Washington, Ohio and Western Railroad and the electric Washington-Alexandria and Falls Church Railway. These early modes of transportation tied the developing neighborhood to East Falls Church in Fairfax County, rather than to the central commercial core of Arlington County forming in Clarendon. Not long after World War I, the existing streets of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls were paved in anticipation of new residential development to serve the growing population of the Washington metropolitan area and, with an increasing passion for the automobile, Washington Boulevard was widened. This main thoroughfare, while strengthening the connection of the neighborhood with East Falls Church, established a more direct relationship to Clarendon and the many quickly developing subdivisions and resubdivisions throughout Arlington County. Due to the neighborhood's accessibility by automobile and public-sponsored bus lines that replaced the streetcar in 1935, Highland Park-Overlee Knolls was fully developed as a commuting suburb of Washington, D.C. by the mid-1950s. Advertisements typically touted its suburban setting and easy accessibility to the nation's capital, where a number of the prospective residents worked.

The development of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls also provides a study of neighborhood planning from its initial platting as Fostoria in 1890 by a single subdivider to its development as a cohesive neighborhood under the direction of numerous speculative builders extolling the much-acclaimed fundamentals of the FHA and the Better Homes movement in the second quarter of the twentieth century. Historically a farming area, which is reflected by the Washington/Torreyson Farm House, Highland Park-Overlee Knolls was first platted in part by a subdivider, who acquired and surveyed the land, developed a neighborhood plan, laid out the building lots and roads, and provided limited amenities such as water and electricity. Newspaper articles from the period recount that the Fostoria Land and Development Company would build any type of dwelling the customer required; yet, the lots offered for sale by the real estate company were as a rule unimproved. Although the cost of these vacant lots was reasonably priced for middle-income buyers and the neighborhood was easily accessible by public transportation, development was remarkably limited. This was common for the few subdivisions in western Arlington County created in the late nineteenth century; the majority of these platted suburbs were absorbed within later subdivisions and the original buildings razed. Yet, in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls development was sparked in the late 1920s with the expansion of the federal government and the advent of the automobile. The resulting large-scale construction of single-family dwellings began under the direction of numerous builders and developers who expanded on the efforts of nineteenth-century subdividers by further improving the neighborhood with the newly platted subdivisions of Over-Lee Knolls (1926) and Section Two Over-Lee Knolls (1927). While the Overlee Knolls subdivisions were not a planned community, the subdividers showed their awareness of the trend of the times in both the layout of the subdivision within the existing topography and the advertising for it. The development was marketed to the moderate income buyer who was willing to drive a little further to live in a suburban community at a price he or she could afford. The improved lots provided fashionable houses that stood alongside the first buildings of Fostoria, which was renamed Highland Park in 1907.

By 1935, the FHA's neighborhood planning ideals had a unifying influence on the growth and unification of this neighborhood. Established under the National Housing Act of 1934, the FHA became the driving force for residential construction in the United States, especially in the suburban areas surrounding Washington, D.C. that enabled the evolving design principles of subdivisions and housing to be examined easily first hand. The builders and development companies of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls sought guidance and support from planned residential neighborhoods such as the adjacent community of Westover, which, like Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, was directly influenced by the burgeoning federal workforce in the Washington metropolitan area and the need for affordable, quality housing. Westover, developed between 1939 and 1948 by Merwin A. Mace (who also was a successful realtor in Overlee Knolls), directly reflected the influence of the FHA's guidelines for small houses and residential neighborhood planning. Accordingly, the builders and developers of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls began to apply principles of mass production, standardization, and prefabrication to house construction on a scale larger than any experienced in the neighborhood's history. Unlike the first homebuyers of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls who favored a vacant lot where a house of their choosing would be constructed, prospective homeowners of this period were provided with completed houses, typically outfitted with all of the available modern conveniences. These modest houses epitomized the architect-designed plans for the construction of small houses for families of moderate means touted by such nationally recognized organizations as Better Homes in America, Inc. and the American Institute of Architects, which frequently endorsed the efforts of builders and developers in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls by selecting demonstration homes that represented their values. Thus the subdivisions, additions, and resubdivisions of Over Lee Ridge (1940), Richmond Hill Section Three (1946), Richmond Hill Section Four (1947), and Highland Park Village (1947), although platted separately by individual developers and real estate companies, all uniformly illustrate the widely accepted standards and fundamentals of the FHA and national organizations seeking to improve family life through a detached single-family house, the most favored form of domestic housing. The planned subdivision of Parkhurst, constructed between 1938 and 1940 in the northeast corner of Overlee Knolls, was one of the earliest FHA-insured subdivision developments in Arlington County offering low-cost, single-family, detached housing. The success of these later subdivisions, additions, and resubdivisions roughly located between Fostoria and the first two subdivisions of Overlee Knolls, fostered new construction within the older areas and thus created a cohesive neighborhood that has been collectively known as Highland Park-Overlee Knolls since the 1930s, when the civic association was founded.

The FHA not only set guidelines for architectural design and construction techniques, but also for the overall plan of the community and neighborhood, which is most evident throughout the later subdivisions of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls. Because of its location in western Arlington County, which was largely undeveloped when Fostoria was platted in 1890, the subdivisions, additions, and resubdivisions that have come to be cohesively known as Highland Park-Overlee Knolls were intended to be self sufficient. Yet the required amenities, with the exception of public transportation and roads, were not fully developed until the construction of Walter Reed Elementary School in 1938, two commercial buildings with six storefronts in the 1940s, the Resurrection Evangelical Lutheran Church in 1941, and the Westover Branch of the Arlington County Public Library in 1963. The tremendous growth of the neighborhood in the second quarter of the twentieth century as a result of the improved amenities required the Resurrection Evangelical Lutheran Church to be substantially enlarged in 1958, resulting in the demolition of the original 1941 section. The new structure, while better meeting the needs of the growing congregation, reflected the neighborhood's transition from the Victorian era when Fostoria was platted to the Modern Movement with the platting of the three post-World War II subdivisions. The public services and modern facilities provided to the neighborhood from its founding through to its mid-twentieth-century growth demonstrate the importance of neighborhood planning and how the guidelines of the FHA and the Better Homes movement inspired development, even for speculative builders and developers who did not receive government-insured mortgages. Thus, Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, with its well-established domestic facilities and accessibility to major transportation routes, at long last proved to be one of the best locations in Arlington County for "the integration of the suburban ideals of home ownership and community in a single real estate transaction."⁴ This for many residents of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, as stated in the Multiple Property Document listing "Historic Residential Suburbs of the United States, 1830-1960" under which this historic district is being nominated, "...meant the attainment of middle-class status, financial prosperity, and family stability—the fulfillment of the American dream."⁵

Criterion C: That embody the distinctive characteristics of a type, period, or method of construction or that represent the work of a master, or that possess high artistic values, or that represent a significant and distinguishable entity whose components may lack individual distinction.

The suburban neighborhood of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls meets Criterion C of the National Register of Historic Places for its substantial concentration of domestic architecture from the late nineteenth to mid-twentieth centuries, representing the Queen Anne, Colonial Revival, Craftsman, Tudor Revival, and Modern Movement styles popular during each phase of development. Local builders and developers built the majority of residences in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, offering single-family houses touted for incorporating modern construction techniques, new energy-efficient materials, and convenient amenities. The area's early farming history is reflected by the vernacular Washington/Torreyson Farm House, a wood-frame I-house constructed sometime between circa 1879 and 1905 on a rising knoll overlooking the future neighborhood. The Fostoria subdivision, platted in 1890, is identified by its rare enclave of late-nineteenth-century, Queen Anne-style domestic architecture in a neighborhood and county that developed primarily in the first half of the twentieth century. As the neighborhood continued to develop in the early twentieth century, the Colonial Revival style became prominent, lending stylistic elements to a growing range of traditional and new building forms from the bungalow and Cape Cod to the minimal traditional and the two-story rectangular box with wings. Most of these dwellings are set back from the street and are augmented by original sun porches, enclosed side wings, and attached garages. The houses of this period, following the fundamentals of the FHA and national organizations like the Better Homes movement that promoted quality affordable housing, filled vacant lots within existing subdivisions, as well as in portions of the neighborhood that were resubdivided to provide more, albeit smaller lots. The last of the subdivisions, additions, and resubdivisions – Parkhurst (1938), Over Lee Ridge (1940), Richmond Hill Section Three (1946) and Section Four (1947), and Highland Park Village (1947) – were platted between the existing subdivisions of Fostoria (renamed Highland Park) and Overlee Knolls, uniting the two existing neighborhoods. The dwellings improving these newly created lots were modest with minimal ornamentation, constructed mainly by local real estate investors offering Cape Cods and two-story houses with rectangular forms ornamented in a variety of styles, including the Colonial Revival and Tudor Revival. The small house fundamentals of the FHA and the Better Homes movement are clearly evident in the forms, styles, and materials from this period. Construction of single dwellings continued throughout the neighborhood during the early 1950s, reflecting the tremendous need for housing in the post-war years. These dwellings incorporate modern technology such as steel and concrete-block framing, new materials vetted during World War II like asbestos-cement and aluminum siding, and innovative building forms that demonstrate the changing trends in house designs due to a shift in consumer preferences and increasing incomes. In fact, many of the attributes of the ranch house, especially the unobstructed picture window, were being incorporated into traditional forms as homeowners began to crave modern alternatives to conventional designs. The arrival of the Modern Movement, specifically in the post-World War II era, influenced the architectural forms and styles of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls as it did no other neighborhood in Arlington County. The wide range of forms from this defining period includes variations of the ranch house and introduction of Arlington County's own "California-type house." New construction materials, typically used to provide the only means of stylistic ornamentation, were introduced and traditional materials, scarce during the years of the Great Depression and World Wars, were reinterpreted. Unlike most of the pre-war construction, housing of the Modern Movement in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls was typically not grouped in enclaves or spread over entire blocks, which was traditionally the practice in Arlington County in the mid-twentieth century. Rather, these domestic forms were interspersed amongst traditional forms, possibly as a way to soften their inauguration into a neighborhood that began developing fifty years earlier. Often, a ranch house was erected on the lot neighboring a Craftsman-style bungalow or a two-story Colonial Revival-style box. The mingling of building forms, styles, and materials from several distinct periods allows for a comprehensive study of architecture and suburban development as it was practiced by developers and builders in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries and the effects of the FHA and national organizations promoting to make "convenient, attractive and wholesome homes accessible to all American families."

By the mid-1950s, Highland Park-Overlee Knolls was fully developed as a cohesive residential community supported by social and commercial services. These facilities, located within and immediately adjacent to the boundaries of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, have created a self-sufficient neighborhood. Within Highland Park-Overlee Knolls are a former school building, a church, and three parks that all provide space for recreational activities and community events. The Washington Boulevard commercial strip cuts through the center of the neighborhood, uniting it with the contemporaneous planned neighborhood of Westover. Although largely outside the historic district boundaries, the commercial buildings along Washington Boulevard create an overall sense of place for Highland Park-Overlee Knolls by providing a wide range of needs of its residents. Interstate 66, established in 1961 along the former route of the Washington and Old Dominion Railroad, bounds the neighborhood on its southern edge, providing residents with an easily accessible high-speed freeway that ties Northern Virginia with Washington, D.C.

Multiple Property Nomination Registration Requirements

Highland Park-Overlee Knolls is being nominated under the Multiple Property Document (MPD), Historic Residential Suburbs in the United States, 1830-1960 (National Park Service, 2002). This neighborhood possesses the physical and associative characteristics typical of all four subtypes outlined in the MPD as historic residential suburbs – Railroad and Horsecar Suburbs, 1830-1890; Streetcar Suburbs, 1888 to 1928; Early Automobile Suburbs, 1908 to 1945; and Post-World War II and Early Freeway Suburbs, 1945 to 1960. As stated in the Registration Requirements of the MPD, Highland Park-Overlee Knolls qualifies under Criterion A because it “reflects an important historic trend in the development and growth of a locality... [and it] represents an important event or association, such as the expansion of housing associated with wartime industries during World War II.” Under Criterion C, Highland Park-Overlee Knolls is home to a “collection of residential architecture... - Suburb possesses the artistic design and many of the physical characteristics intended by the developers, planners, landscape architects, architects, and engineers working collaboratively during the period of significance.
- Neighborhood reflects the principles and practices of subdivision design and residential development representative of mainstream national trends from 1830 to 1960.
- Suburb reflects artistic qualities of landscape design in the layout of streets, the arrangement of homes on house lots, the planting of vegetation for ornamentation or shade, and the creation of a parklike setting.
- Neighborhood exemplifies the role that a certain type of developer (subdivider, home-builder, community builder, operative builder, or merchant builder) played in the growth and development of the locality or metropolitan region.
- Subdivision contains a collection of residences in types and styles representative of local building practices, economic trends, and popular tastes in suburban housing associated with one or more stages of a community’s suburbanization.
- Community was designed to conform to FHA-standards and represents one of the “earliest,” “most successful,” “largest,” “finest,” or “most influential” examples locally.

- Suburb possesses a high degree of integrity and exhibiting distinctive elements of design in the subdivision plan, landscape architecture, or domestic architecture.
- Neighborhood reflects important advances, established principles, or popular in trends in community planning, landscape architecture, and architecture.
- Suburb contains homes in a variety of period styles, or representing the work of one or a number of noted architects.
- Collection of residential architecture includes fine examples of one or more locally important housing types (e.g. bungalows and foursquares).
- Residential area was associated with important local industries or local events and activities that are known to [have] stimulated or sustained suburban growth and development.⁷

Physical Integrity

Many of the wood-frame dwellings in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls have been re clad in replacement or synthetic sidings. Aluminum siding, developed before vinyl siding, was used in the recladding of a small number of houses in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls as late as the 1960s. Although the manufacturing of aluminum began in the 1880s, it was not until the 1920s that ALCOA (Aluminum Company of America) began promoting its use for architectural elements. In 1937, Indiana machinist Frank Hoess began experimenting with steel siding that imitated wood weatherboard siding. After receiving a patent in 1939, Hoess joined forces with Metal Building Products of Detroit and marketed siding made of ALCOA aluminum. This new product could be nailed to existing siding or attached directly to studs.⁸ Please note that aluminum siding was often an original cladding material for houses constructed in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls after World War II and during the period of significance for the historic district. Vinyl siding was introduced as a home-improvement product by ALCOA in the 1960s. Initially, the manufacturing process that produced vinyl siding made it difficult to manufacture the product quickly and to control the final shape. However, after the industry improved its manufacturing techniques during the 1970s and 1980s, production increased dramatically. Not only was the product produced faster, but it was more durable and was offered in a larger range of colors than aluminum siding.⁹ Since 1986, the use of vinyl nationwide has doubled, surpassing the use of aluminum siding and reaching 2.2 billion square feet in 1992.¹⁰ Modern synthetic sidings such as Hardiplank are cement board sidings (also known as fiber cement board sidings) developed in the mid-1980s. This durable material has a wood-grain look, a plain smooth look, or a stucco-type finish, and it also comes in simulated cedar shingle planks. The use of aluminum, vinyl, or more modern synthetic siding as a replacement material does not compromise the integrity of the buildings because they reflect common maintenance practices and modern trends in suburban cladding materials. Further, this horizontally laid cladding mimicked the horizontality of the original cladding materials, such as weatherboard and asbestos siding (which are often intact under the replacement materials).

Additions and alterations, like the use of replacement materials, are common throughout Highland Park-Overlee Knolls. In general, these changes do not diminish the overall integrity of the historic district or the integrity of most of the individual buildings. When the additions substantially altered the original form, scale, and fenestration of the building, it is noted as non-contributing. Typically, the additions and alterations are sensitive to the original design, workmanship, materials, and feeling of contemporaneous buildings located in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, while often ensuring the integrity of the main block. A small number of teardowns and new construction have occurred in the neighborhood around the turn of the twenty-first century. The new construction attempts to be compatible with the existing architectural styles found throughout the neighborhood (although their style renders them easily identifiable). Therefore, additions, alterations, and new construction have not diminished Highland Park-Overlee Knolls as a whole and this neighborhood possesses all seven qualities of integrity (location, setting, workmanship, materials, design, feelings, and association).

Developmental history/additional historic context information (if appropriate)

Prior to the Subdivision of Fostoria: 1730-1890

Highland Park-Overlee Knolls is located in western Arlington, a twenty-six-square-mile county located in Northern Virginia across the Potomac River from Washington, D.C. The county is bounded by Fairfax County to the north and west, the City of Alexandria and Four Mile Run to the south, and the waters of the Potomac River to the east. In 1730, the land that is now Highland Park-Overlee Knolls was part of the Northern Neck Proprietary, a 652-acre land grant owned by James Going and Simon Pearson. George Minor purchased 500 acres of this land in 1759. In February 1820, ninety acres of Minor's land was sold to John A. Sommers; this corresponds to the Fostoria subdivision to the south of 18th Street North. By the early 1830s, the portion of the land to the north was purchased by Nicholas Febrey; this is the location of the Overlee Knolls subdivisions. During this period, the land was agricultural, worked by tenant farmers and some slaves with few permanent improvements. Yet, in 1851, Henry Febrey, the son of Nicholas Febrey, constructed an imposing house on the property (current address is 2230 North Powhatan Street in Leeway-Overlee). Three years later, in 1853, the Alexandria, Loudoun and Hampshire Railway extended its route southward along Four Mile Run to Alexandria, with a single track laid to the south of the Sommers and Febrey tracts by September 1859. The railroad was devastated both physically and financially during the Civil War and after changing hands numerous times, was restored in 1868. In January 1882, the railroad was purchased by the Washington and Western Railroad Company, which subsequently sold it to the Washington, Ohio and Western Railroad Company. The Fostoria station was located at the south end of North Ohio Street near what is now the I-66 right-of-way; the station is no longer extant.

The Washington/Torreyson Farm House at 1600 North Lexington Street possibly predates the platting of Fostoria in 1890 and reflects the area's agricultural nature prior to suburban development. Research conducted to date and a physical examination of the building suggests that the dwelling most likely dates to 1879 and, as such, may be one of the oldest remaining farm houses in Arlington County. The main block of this vernacular dwelling may be attributed to James Washington, an African American who, in 1866 and 1875, purchased the land on which the house is located from mid-nineteenth-century farmer Basil Hall (also often spelled Basil). It is known that Washington owned the property for nearly 30 years until he sold it to Andrew Duke Torreyson, a prominent local citizen and early-twentieth-century dairy farmer. Torreyson owned the property for almost 20 years and, according to his granddaughter, he never resided in the house but instead used it as a tenant house for laborers on his farm. Locally designated an historic landmark in 2010, the Washington/Torreyson Farm House illustrates the practical simplicity of rural residential architecture. It is an example of a vernacular dwelling that typifies Arlington County's rural and agricultural origins and is also only one of four known surviving residences in Arlington that was originally associated with a working dairy farm.¹¹

The arrival of the railroad was expected to greatly impact the development and growth of western Arlington County and landowners began to subdivide and sell tracts with great anticipation. The heirs of John Sommers sold his 90-acre parcel to J. William Foster for $10,000 in May 1890.¹² Foster was a lawyer based in Washington D.C. who, because of the railroad, was able to live in Leesburg, Virginia. On November 19, 1890, Foster deeded the land to his company, the Fostoria Land and Development Company.¹³ The company, which was seen in advertisements as Fostoria Land and Improvement Company, was incorporated in November 1890.¹⁴ William E. Abbott served as president, with James M. Hoge as secretary, and Madison A. Ballinger acting as the real estate broker. Abbott (b. 1849) was also a grocer with stores in Washington, D.C. At the time of the 1900 Federal Census, he resided in Washington, D.C. with his wife Hattie, and their five children.¹⁵ Besides working at the Fostoria Land and Development Company, Hoge (b. 1846) was a feed merchant, working with his brother William S. Hoge at W.S. Hoge & Brother. His interest in development prompted him to also serve as secretary of the Washington and Falls Church Railway, which purchased the right-of-way through Fostoria in 1895. In 1910, Hoge resided in Washington, D.C. at the National Hotel with his wife Julia and their daughter.¹⁶ The real estate office and home of Ballinger, who was also an attorney, were located in northwest Washington, D.C.¹⁷

The Fostoria Land and Development Company functioned as subdividers, the earliest type of residential developer. Subdividers acquired the undeveloped land, which was often previously used for agricultural purposes, and had it surveyed. They oversaw the development of a plan with building lots and roads laid out in a pattern. Improvements to the entire site were typically the responsibility of the subdividers. The range of improvements, as stated in the Multiple Property Document listing “Historic Residential Suburbs of the United States, 1830-1960,” “...varied but usually included utilities, graded roads, curbs and sidewalks, storm-water drains, tree planting, and graded common areas and house lots.”¹⁸ Subdividers made their profit by selling lots on acreage that they had improved with streets and other infrastructure. Most often streets were laid out in a grid pattern which, because there was no comprehensive planning, was unrelated to the existing or future development of adjacent parcels. Individual purchasers arranged for the construction of their houses and, therefore, there was no consistency in the style or size of the dwellings. The initial subdivision and development of Fostoria in 1890 was typical of suburban subdivision practices of its time and is still evident today in the layout and original dwellings. Despite being surrounded by residential suburban development dating from the second quarter of the twentieth century, the triangular-shaped subdivision of Fostoria is clearly evident on maps of Arlington County today. Additionally, although subdivision of some of the larger lots has occurred, many of the wider lots of Fostoria remain intact as originally platted.

Because land was a popular investment among Washington, D.C.’s middle class, lots in new subdivisions like Fostoria were often purchased by investors with no immediate intention of building. As a result of this, development in new subdivisions was sometimes stagnant, to the detriment of investors. To counteract this, the promoter of the Fostoria subdivision, in announcing the June 1891 auction of lots, offered special inducements to build. A public sale of lots posted by M.A. Ballinger on June 18, 1891 in the Washington Post announced the benefits of building in Fostoria:

Situated on the Richmond and Danville Railroad (W. & O. branch) this side of Falls Church. It is 350 feet above Washington; it is 3 ½ miles from the Aqueduct bridge; it is convenient to churches; it is convenient to stores and post-offices and free telephone connection with Washington; it has pure air; it has pure water; the Norfolk and Western Railroad has its surveyed line of the south line of Fostoria; the Washington and Falls Church Electric Railroad will pass through Fostoria; transportation is cheap to Fostoria; it is a short and beautiful drive from Washington to Fostoria; the streets are graded and trees [are] now set out at Fostoria. Special arrangements will be made with persons desiring to build at Fostoria.¹⁹

A June 24, 1891 advertisement in the Washington Post described the “Special Inducements to Build,”

The management has determined to give, to such person or persons as shall purchase Lots at this sale, and who shall construct the first ten houses thereon, A GOOD LOT, valued by the Company at $200, for each of the ten houses so constructed by January 1st, 1892, and to cost not less than one thousand dollars each. The question of who is first, to be determined by the time of breaking ground and notice to the Company of the intention of the owner to build.²⁰

To ensure the new construction in Fostoria was of quality and presented fashionable stylistic designs, the improvement company also intended to “...also give to the person erecting the PRETTIEST house of the first ten houses built another lot valued by the Company at $200, this to be determined by an architect...”²¹ Yet, like many contemporaneous subdivisions, especially those in western Arlington County, development was slow in Fostoria, leaving numerous lots vacant for subsequent improvement. The economic downturn of 1893 may have further slowed the development of Fostoria. Griffith M. Hopkins’s map, “The Vicinity of Washington, D.C.,” published in 1894, shows that only three buildings had been constructed by 1894 in Fostoria; one of the buildings was the railway station.

Fostoria Becomes Highland Park: 1907-1935

Development at the turn of the twentieth century was located predominately in the eastern corner of Arlington County, where bridges and streetcar lines traversed the Potomac River to easily reach Washington, D.C. The growth was primarily residential, as housing was constructed for federal government workers who sought a less urban environment. Despite the existence of the railway, which provided easy access to the western part of the county, few suburban developments like Fostoria existed at the turn of the twentieth century. Yet, the continuing growth of the federal government and the steadily increasing need for housing outside the federal city were clearly evident to real estate developers such as William S. Hoge, Jr., who sensed the possibilities in Fostoria. Born in Washington, D.C. in 1879, Hoge worked with his father at the W.S. Hoge & Brother feed store, which sold flour, feed, hay, grain and “all kinds of country produce.” The company also maintained a grain warehouse on Delaware Avenue, near H Street, N.E.²² Like his uncle, Hoge, Jr. was interested in real estate development and in 1907 took over operation of the Fostoria Land and Development Company. The name of the struggling subdivision was changed to “Highland Park,” as a way to signify a modification in the company as well as to better evoke images of the cool, breezy high ground where new houses could be constructed within a park-like setting. Typical of suburban developments at the turn of the twentieth century, Hoge advertised the healthful benefits of country life rendered accessible by public rail.²³ He continued to follow the fundamentals of the original subdividers, offering potential residents the option to “build your house to your own idea.” The vacant, unimproved lots were inexpensive and could be purchased by monthly installments. Yet, despite Hoge’s aggressive advertisement campaigns to sell the 346 vacant lots within Highland Park, development was slow. The 1910 census records, which identified Fostoria in the margins despite the name change, document the fledgling subdivision was home to eighteen families including that of Hoge, Jr.²⁴ The majority of the eighteen houses were constructed on single lots, with only a few exceptions straddling two adjoining lots.

At the time that William Hoge purchased the Fostoria subdivision, Arlington County was largely agricultural. The activities of World War I, which the United States entered in 1917, significantly expanded the federal government workforce and thus the population of the Washington metropolitan area. The 1920 census recorded 16,040 Arlington residents as compared to 6,430 in 1910. Further, by the early 1920s, affordable automobiles, within the reach of middle-class budgets, had begun to revolutionize transportation and thus residential development patterns. Arterial roads became more crucial to suburban development than rail lines, which were often replaced by buses. Hoge was one of the few real estate men who was active in the first quarter of the twentieth century in promoting Arlington County as suitable for the suburban expansion of the burgeoning national capital. He worked for both administrative improvements, such as planning and zoning, and physical improvements, such as roads, that would make Arlington County more attractive to developers. Like most communities in the 1920s, Arlington County had neither planning staff nor zoning but by the mid-1920s many in the business community came to see planning and zoning as essential to the orderly development of the fast-growing suburb and to the protection of property values. As described by Arlington’s first county planning engineer, “it became evident to the farsighted and civic-minded citizens that some control was needed to prevent the indiscriminate mixture of incompatible land uses throughout the County.”²⁵ After the Virginia General Assembly passed enabling legislation in 1927, a zoning commission was appointed to develop a zoning ordinance, which was adopted by the Arlington County Board of Supervisors in February 1930. A general development plan for the county was adopted at the same time. The Arlington County Zoning Commission was funded in large part by the Arlington Chamber of Commerce.²⁶ Hoge was a board member of the Chamber of Commerce and one of the active proponents of instituting city planning and zoning in Arlington County.²⁷

William Hoge was also involved in one of the most dramatic road improvements contemplated after World War I—a boulevard with a 200-foot right-of-way leading from Memorial Bridge (then in the planning stages) west across Arlington County. The boulevard was to run westward through Virginia, linking with similar roads traversing the continent on a southern route that stretched from Washington, D.C., to San Diego, via New Orleans and New Mexico. It was to be named in honor of Virginia’s own General Robert E. Lee.²⁸ Much of the impetus for the national boulevard came from private interests, organized into local, state and national highway associations. In many cases, property owners, including Hoge who recognized the benefits, offered to donate rights of way for its construction. Hoge was chairman of the rights-of-way committee of the Lee Highway Association of Arlington County. As planned by the Lee Highway Association in the mid-1920s, the new boulevard would have passed close to, or possibly through, Highland Park and its neighboring subdivision to the north, Overlee Knolls. Yet, the final route selected by the state passed more than one half mile south of the neighborhood and did not greatly affect development; because an existing road was named Lee Highway (located to the north of Overlee Knolls), the memorial route was named Arlington Boulevard. By 1931, an arterial road was constructed through Highland Park/Overlee Knolls, providing access to Arlington Boulevard and the Memorial Bridge. Significantly stimulating construction in the northwestern part of Arlington County, the road was originally known as Memorial Drive and later renamed Washington Boulevard.

Unlike many operative builders of the early twentieth century who chose to abandon their subdivisions in favor of tracts that proved more promising, William Hoge's commitment to Highland Park and the construction of primary roads to the area was unrelenting. His allegiance was clearly tested because it was not until the mid-1930s that construction commenced unreservedly throughout Highland Park as Hoge launched an aggressive campaign to sell lots and construct dwellings, now easily accessible by newly laid roads originating in Washington, D.C.

Febrey Property Becomes Overlee Knolls: 1926-1927

Between 1921 and 1936, a period coined the "golden age of highway building," more than 420,000 miles of roads were built in the United States. These intercity highways and roads made new lands, like those surrounding the nation's capital, available for suburbanization, forever changing the landscape of Arlington County.²⁹ The Febrey property, which to this point still remained largely agricultural land used for truck farming, was to be bisected by these new primary transportation routes that would most certainly bring developers and new residents to the area. Presumably, this contributed to the family's decision to sell some of their holdings in 1926 and 1927. In a number of separate deeds, the land was purchased by an investment company known as Arlington Properties Corporation. The subdivisions laid out on the Febrey property were known as Over-Lee Knolls; the name was later changed to Overlee Knolls. While the neighboring subdivision of Highland Park, as originally planned in the late nineteenth century, relied on rail transportation, the various Overlee Knolls subdivisions reflected the impact of the automobile on transportation and suburbanization. Although the neighborhood was still served by electric rail, advertisements assumed that potential purchasers would arrive by automobile or bus from Washington, D.C., always directing them to come via Lee Highway. Overlee Knolls was subtitled in one advertisement "Over the Lee Highway."³⁰

The Overlee Knolls subdivisions were traditional in their creation, just as Fostoria had been almost 35 years earlier. The Arlington Properties Corporation was composed of investors who, acting as subdividers, installed the subdivision infrastructure and planned to reap their profits from the sale of lots to individual buyers, developers, and builders. They were not builders or what were coming to be known as community builders, whose developments included the construction of houses and, often, community facilities. At the time that Overlee Knolls was platted, many of the neighborhoods and subdivisions being created in Arlington County and in the surrounding suburban counties were being developed by community builders or operative builders, the latter taking control of the entire operation as finances allowed.

At the time Overlee Knolls was subdivided in the mid-1920s, there was much discussion within the architectural and planning professions and in the general press of what the ideal suburb should be. Planned communities such as the Country Club District in Kansas City, Shaker Heights outside Cleveland, Ohio, Forest Hills in New York, and Radburn, New Jersey, became models for developers across the nation. Drawing on the city planning movement of the early twentieth century, large-scale developers had begun planning their projects according to master plans that addressed the needs of residents for a cohesive neighborhood with ready access to transportation and community services. These subdivisions, usually designed for residents at the upper income levels, were marked by a respect for the natural topography of their sites, which was often lacking in earlier subdivisions, and the enhancement of the natural environment with landscaping and parks. As described by one historian, "The preservation of a natural topography was a key feature of progressive subdivisions.... By the 1920s, subdivision platting that accommodated nature's design was considered both aesthetically superior and less expensive than forcing a subdivision to fit a flattened, rigid checkerboard grid."³¹

While the Overlee Knolls subdivisions were not a planned community, the subdividers showed their awareness of the trend of the times in both the layout of the subdivision and its advertisement. Although much of Overlee Knolls Section 2 follows a grid pattern, most of the streets of Section 1 and some in Section 2 are curvilinear, conforming to the site's naturally hilly topography. The 1926 pre-development offerings that were designed to attract investors to Overlee Knolls advertised that in addition to sewers and sidewalks, the subdivisions offered "Winding Stone-Surfaced Drives, Landscaped Parkways, Electricity, Bubbling Springs, Parks, Playgrounds and Everything Else That Goes Into the Making of an Ideal Home Community...20 Minutes from Your Office Via Concrete Highway or Street Car. Close to Schools, Stores and Churches."³² Unlike the neighborhoods after which it was loosely modeled, Overlee Knolls was marketed to the moderate income buyer who was willing to drive a little further to live in a suburban neighborhood at a price he could afford.

The original agent for the sale of lots in Overlee Knolls was Merwin A. Mace, a realtor, developer, and builder who later developed several planned communities including GlebeWood Village (1937-1938), Westmont (1939), and Westover (1939-1940), which is to the immediate east of Highland Park/Overlee Knolls. Mace, who built a few speculative houses in Overlee Knolls, advertised "5, 6 and 7 room home bargains from $7,000 to "9,000" on terms akin to the cost of rent."³³ Over the course of his career, Mace became known as a "civic-minded pioneer" because of his company's high construction standards and low building costs. Mace's houses were hailed for their individuality and structural quality, attributes typically associated with higher-cost neighborhoods.³⁴

Effects of the Better Homes and Small House Movement in Highland Park and Overlee Knolls

The housing constructed in both Highland Park and Overlee Knolls in the late 1920s and early 1930s exemplifies modern housing constructed for moderate income buyers of that period. In the years following World War I national attention focused on the need to provide good housing for families with limited incomes. Architects, planners, social reformers, the building and real estate industry, and elements of the press sought ways to encourage and facilitate the construction of quality housing for families of moderate means. Their efforts were often endorsed by national and local government officials and organizations. One of the leading organizers of this movement was Better Homes in America, Inc. A concept originally spearheaded by a women's magazine, Better Homes in America became a national educational organization in 1923 with Secretary of Commerce Herbert Hoover as its president. At that time, there was a severe housing shortage, estimated at one million units, resulting from the diversion of materials and manufacturing during World War I. Further, much of the housing constructed in the previous decade had been designed for the upper income levels. The organization's goal was to make "convenient, attractive and wholesome homes accessible to all American families" through research and publications at the national level and through model houses, demonstrations, and educational programs offered by local affiliates. It held that "the happiest and most wholesome home life is possible for a family with growing children only in a detached single-family house."³⁵ It sought to encourage quality building and efficient design, the installation of modern, labor saving devices to reduce household drudgery, and economical furnishings, along with broader goals for improving family life. These were all elements sought by prospective homeowners in the 1920s and 1930s, and the developers and builders of both Highland Park and Overlee Knolls rose to the challenge to provide these modern amenities for middle-class residents seeking to live in western Arlington County.

The dwelling at 2103 North Quantico Street in Overlee Knolls was selected in 1929 as the demonstration home to represent Arlington County in the national Better Homes in America demonstration week. The demonstration home, which was constructed by Mace, was described as a "five-room cottage of the English type, of shingle and frame construction" with features such as "cedar-lined closets, an automatic electric range, sidewall lighting fixtures and other features usually found only in homes of much greater cost."³⁶ The house included a built-in garage with sliding doors, a sure indication that by the time Overlee Knolls was being developed the automobile had become an integral element of suburban family life. However, at that time most garages were situated to the side or rear of dwellings and the built-in garage was a novel feature, newly popularized by its use in the new town of Radburn, New Jersey (1928-1929). The cost of the house at 2103 North Quantico Street, including decoration and furnishings provided by a local store, was advertised at less than $10,000.

Simultaneously with the activities of Better Homes in America, the American Institute of Architects sought to encourage builders to use architect-designed plans for the construction of small houses that were defined as having a maximum of six rooms. It sponsored the Small House Architects Service Bureau to provide architect-designed plans and specifications for builders. Architect-designed small house plans and working drawings were available to builders from various publications and catalogs and the New York-based Home Owners Service Institute. Increasingly, in the 1920s, popular publications addressed the interests and needs of owners of small homes. As a result, prospective homeowners were more informed, the quality of construction of smaller houses improved, and the popular interest in design and more widespread use of architects to design moderately priced housing resulted in a diversity of styles. Nationally, bungalows, Cape Cods, and the American Foursquare were extremely popular forms, dressed in various traditional styles; the most popular of these was the Colonial Revival style ornamenting two-story, brick-veneered or wood-framed houses.³⁷ The promotion of architect-designed small houses led to a cohesive variety of architectural styles, forms, and materials that makes Highland Park-Overlee Knolls one of the most diverse and amalgamated residential neighborhoods of Arlington County.

Impetuses for Growth in Highland Park and Overlee Knolls

The speculative housing constructed in Highland Park and Overlee Knolls, both before and during the years of the Great Depression, was designed for buyers of moderate means but nevertheless advertised as offering features associated with more expensive housing as the Better Homes and Small House movements promoted. For example, advertising for houses constructed by William Hoge beginning in 1933 promised economy with quality: "Popular Priced Homes, $5,550 to $6,350. For those of modest income, Highland Park Homes are the answer to where to find the better class home in a select, restricted community at a price limited means can afford."³⁸

William Hoge appears to have renewed his efforts to develop Highland Park in 1932, both through the sale of vacant lots and the construction of speculative housing. In May 1932 he advertised an auction of "40 choice homesites and business lots at absolute auction" offering restrictions, electricity, gas, and hard surfaced streets.³⁹ The next year he announced plans to build fifty two- and three-bedroom houses with a "thoroughly modern business section for stores with adequate parking...in a properly zoned area."⁴⁰ The 1935 Franklin map of Arlington County shows that virtually all of the Highland Park development took place on what are now known as McKinley Road, North Nicholas Street and the cross streets between them, particularly Washington Boulevard and 16th Street North.⁴¹ Despite Hoge's announced plans to build fifty houses, more than half the lots east of North Ohio Street remained vacant and no construction had taken place west of North Ohio Street or on the north side of 18th Street North.

In the first decade after Overlee Knolls was subdivided, most of the construction was clustered along 20th Street North and 22nd Street North to the east of North Ohio Street in Section 2. Although platted, 21st Street North had not yet been constructed. Section 1 of Overlee Knolls remained almost entirely unimproved, and no interior roads had even been constructed except for a dead-end section of 21st Street North off North Quantico Street, providing access to three dwellings.

Zoning had been instituted in Arlington County in 1930 in advance of the anticipated completion of Memorial Bridge, which was expected to greatly accelerate the development. Hoge's development of Highland Park with a defined commercial area to serve its residents exhibits the developer's enthusiastic support of the county's newly instituted zoning regulations as well as his recognition of the need to provide services for newly developing communities. Mace, in his development of the neighboring planned residential subdivision of Westover that was developed between 1939 and 1948, also provided community services, such as stores, a post office, a library, and schools. The close proximity of Westover made these amenities available to the residents of Highland Park and Overlee Knolls, and also reduced construction costs for the developers.

House construction continued in Highland Park and Overlee Section 2 in the second half of the 1930s but in that period the most significant impetus for construction in the area now encompassed by the Highland Park-Overlee Knolls neighborhood came from the newly created Federal Housing Administration. Although Hoge was able to launch his Highland Park building campaign in 1933, the housing industry in general was in dire straits, with the nation still in the grips of the Great Depression that had begun with the stock market crash in October 1929. Restoration of the housing market was widely viewed as an essential step to achieving the national recovery. In 1934, Congress enacted the National Housing Act, which created the Federal Housing Administration (FHA). As described in a history of the FHA, "The immediate objectives of the Act were to make money available for repairs and new construction, to revive the homebuilding industry, to put men back to work, to restore confidence and to improve general economic conditions. The long range objectives were even more ambitious – to reform mortgage lending practices, to broaden opportunities for home ownership, to raise housing standards."⁴² The objectives are illustrated in the housing that was constructed in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls from 1938 through the 1950s.

The principal mechanism through which the FHA achieved its goals was the provision of mortgage insurance on both single-family and low-cost, multiple-unit housing, thus making housing a more secure investment for both the housing industry and the individual owner. FHA mortgage insurance was intended to be self-supporting and thus the FHA had to establish the financial soundness of the projects it insured. Through the standards and rating systems it set for qualifying for FHA mortgage insurance for each kind of housing it insured, the FHA encouraged the construction of small economical suburban houses and large planned communities with provision of, or access to, good services and transportation, and low density development of multi-family units with recreational open space. It encouraged towns and cities to institute planning and zoning. FHA also opened the housing market to purchasers who could not afford the traditional fifty percent down payment mortgage requirements by insuring long-term amortized mortgages of up to 80 (and later 90) percent of appraised value. For each application the FHA evaluated what it considered the three major factors of mortgage risk: the character of the neighborhood, the quality of the structure, and the credit and character of the borrower.

Although the concept of federally sponsored mortgage insurance was new, many of the FHA's goals and reforms were based on concepts and projects that planners, architects, social reformers, community builders, and others had developed in the previous decades. In 1931, in the depths of the Great Depression, President Herbert Hoover had called the President's Conference on Home Building and Home Ownership to make recommendations for reviving the home building industry, promoting good housing for lower income groups, and expanding home ownership. Its 3,700 attendees, working through numerous committees, produced a series of recommendations ranging from home financing to design, construction, and landscaping. The recommendations of this seminal conference, which brought together experts in the many professions associated with housing from urban planners to manufacturers of housing components, served to guide the FHA as it developed its programs in the years following its creation in 1934.⁴³

Mindful of the way fine residential neighborhoods in many cities had deteriorated into areas of boarding houses and small businesses with a resulting loss of property value, the FHA set criteria that favored economically strong areas protected by zoning requirements and, often, restrictive covenants. It also tended to favor suburban development like that taking place in Arlington County, which was easily accessible to employees of the Washington, D.C.-based FHA for immediate study and evaluation. The advent of public and automobile transportation opened up less expensive suburban land for housing development, thus making it economically feasible to reduce the population density of developments designed to house moderate income families. While the 1934 FHA legislation provided for an initial program of money for repairs and improvements of existing housing to provide an immediate stimulus for the building trades and a program for non-profit development of moderate-income apartment complexes, its principal focus was on stimulating the construction of well-built, moderately priced, single-family housing in well-planned neighborhoods like Highland Park-Overlee Knolls.

In 1936, FHA published Planning Neighborhoods for Small Houses, which emphasized the importance of creating subdivisions with distinctive neighborhood qualities. It stated that, "Where a neighborhood can be identified and comprehended as such, the feeling of pride and responsibility which the owner has in his own parcel, tends to be extended to the neighborhood as a whole. A sense of community responsibility and a community spirit thus develop, which acts as a stabilizing and sustaining influence in the maintenance of realty values."⁴⁴ FHA set out to bring the benefits of planning to modestly priced housing developments, noting that, "For many years planning has been characteristic of 'exclusive' neighborhoods or subdivisions of high-priced homes.... Unfortunately, neighborhoods for modest dwellings have only rarely been developed in this manner. Frequently they have been produced devoid of plan or protection as lot selling schemes, wholly unrelated to the character of dwellings which might sometime be built."⁴⁵

FHA established standards for evaluating subdivisions which included "(1) sound evidence of continuing demand for housing in the proposed price range; (2) appropriate surroundings and topography; (3) accessibility to schools, employment, and shopping and recreational centers; (4) suitable utility and street improvements; (5) reasonable taxes and assessments; (6) adequate zoning and protective covenants; and (7) conformity to planning regulations and sound principles of design." The minimum protective covenants included regulation of land use, architectural control, side yard and setback regulations, regulation of lot sizes, and prohibition of nuisances.⁴⁶ FHA also offered to review subdividers' preliminary plans and offered free land planning advice to assist them in conforming to FHA requirements.⁴⁷

No indication has been found that the various developers of Highland Park and Overlee Knolls sought approval for FHA financing. Because the FHA has retained only a small sampling of the records of the projects it insured, the absence of FHA involvement cannot be ascertained definitively. However, the construction and development of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls closely followed the standards prescribed by the FHA.

A Planned FHA Subdivision in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls: Parkhurst, 1938-1940

Parkhurst, a planned subdivision constructed between 1938 and 1940, was one of the earliest FHA-insured subdivision developments in Arlington County offering low-cost, single-family, detached housing. This was made possible in February 1938 when Congress enacted amendments to the National Housing Act, which authorized more liberal mortgage terms, increasing the maximum mortgage from 80 to 90 percent of the appraised value and lengthening the permitted amortization to 25 years. The smaller down payment and lower monthly payment increased the affordability of FHA-insured mortgages for people with modest incomes and thus stimulated the construction of modestly priced single-family housing.

Parkhurst exemplifies the characteristics FHA sought to achieve in the planned neighborhoods it insured. As a relatively small subdivision, Parkhurst, as did the other subdivisions of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, relied on nearby pre-existing infrastructure and amenities to serve its residents. Two major arterial roads facilitated transportation into Washington, D.C. – Washington Boulevard, with its commercially zoned area, was two blocks south of the development and Lee Highway was two blocks north. Sewage trunk lines had been installed by 1937. The development was adjacent to the Walter Reed Elementary School, which had opened in 1938 and only a few blocks from the planned Swanson Junior High School, which opened in 1940.⁴⁸

The most distinctive feature of the principal section of Parkhurst is its parkland, dedicated for public use by the developer, Paul B. Parker. The development's single-family houses are sited around the periphery of a very large block and along a Y-shaped road in its interior. The land, known as Horseshoe Park, between the peripheral and inner dwellings was parkland and playground and all individual lots adjoined the parkland. The provision of the parkland conformed to the recommendation of the Parks and Playgrounds section of Planning Neighborhoods for Small Houses, which states that, "It is usually good business for the subdivider to set aside areas for permanent open spaces.... Home sites surrounding such areas are always in demand. Carefully kept records by large real-estate operators show that such open spaces are excellent investments."⁴⁹ Additionally, Parkhurst was sited just half a block from the large playground of Walter Reed Elementary School.

The use of small, interior, dead-end streets in Parkhurst rather than a grid pattern more common to the larger Highland Park-Overlee Knolls neighborhood also conforms to FHA's recommendation that such streets offered distinct advantages, especially to families with small children by reducing the traffic hazard. Further, this benefited the developer by reducing the cost of street improvements.⁵⁰ Most lots in Parkhurst contained 5,000 square feet, the minimum recommended by the FHA and the peripheral rectangular lots conformed to FHA's recommended minimum width of 50 feet. The parkland facilitated meeting FHA's requirement that "Lot areas should be sized and shaped particularly to assure privacy, pleasant outlook and attractive setting for the houses."⁵¹

The design of the Parkhurst houses follows the FHA's recommendation that, "Houses should be so designed as to be in harmony with other houses in the neighborhood. Both monotony and excessive variety of architectural effect should be avoided. When a developer uses only a limited number of house plans, variety and interest may be secured by sometimes having the end elevation and sometimes the side elevation toward the street, by the placement of the garages and by varying the setback line and the planting so that interesting groupings are secured."⁵² Although the size of the lots allowed for the end or side elevations to front the street, this was not the practice in Parkhurst. However, the placement of the garages was varied, including both attached below-grade on the front or side, and at the rear of the structure. The irregular shape of the lots, created by the cul-de-sac, allowed a diversity of setbacks, walkways, and landscaping.

In 1936 FHA, drawing on the Small House and Better Homes movements of the 1920s and 1930s, published Principles of Planning Small Houses to demonstrate that, "without resort to change in methods or materials, or other wide diversion from customary traditions in the home building field...it is still possible to produce a substantial, sanitary, and comfortable type of shelter within the means of families of very modest income."⁵³ The publication illustrated five plans, ranging from approximately 535 square feet to 900 square feet. Each was composed of a single rectangular block, the smallest being a one-story, two-bedroom house set on a concrete slab and the largest being a two-story, three-bedroom house with a basement. The FHA avoided issuing stock plans or specifying styles or materials, stating that it was desirable to maintain and develop local traditions and to produce housing suitable to local topography and climate. However, it emphasized the importance of simplicity and efficiency in design, of durability of materials to ensure reasonable maintenance costs and longevity, and the use of standard lengths of lumber and stock items of millwork to reduce costs. FHA also issued publications on minimum construction requirements for new dwellings in each of its districts, which were geared to local conditions. The 1940 revision to Principles of Planning Small Houses added fireplaces and basements to the plans and called for the standardization of the mechanical and technical parts of the house including plumbing, pipes, closets, cabinets, and windows.

As recommended by FHA, Parker employed an architect, Adolph F. Thelander, to design the dwellings as well as a planning engineer and builder, Leo A. Bonsteel, who designed the development based on the mandates. The modest four-to six-room houses of Parkhurst exhibit the basic rectangular form advocated by FHA in 1936 although they did not replicate the designs depicted in Principles of Planning Small Houses. Parkhurst used its adherence to FHA guidelines as a selling point, advertising "Fully detached homes in a park community planned with the co-operation of the FHA."⁵⁴ Another advertisement emphasized that it was a planned community: "At Parkhurst we have created something entirely new in homes within the moderate income...a planned community with playgrounds and parks ideally located in Arlington, Va. These new homes provide every modern comfort and convenience—yet are sold on terms even less than the average rent. FHA approval is your guarantee of superior quality. Located...just 15 minutes from downtown Washington, 2 blocks from schools, bus lines and shopping center."⁵⁵

By September 1940, both the 40 dwellings in the first section of Parkhurst and a second section of 30 houses on 19th Street North east of North Lexington Street had been sold, and the 25 houses in the third section on the west side of North Madison Street opened for sale.

World War II-Era Growth in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls

Other than within Parkhurst, relatively little other development took place in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls in the second half of the 1930s. Over Lee Ridge had been subdivided but by 1941 only four dwellings had been constructed. Overlee Knolls Section One remained virtually without improvements. Overlee Knolls Section Two, which had approximately 50 dwellings by 1935, changed very little in the late 1930s except for the construction of nine dwellings in the 6000 block of 21st Street. In the Highland Park area of the neighborhood that was first platted as Fostoria a few dwellings were constructed along the north side of 18th Street North on both sides of the Washington Boulevard intersection but the western portion of the subdivision remained unimproved.

Yet, the onset of World War II brought dramatic change to Highland Park-Overlee Knolls. At a time when, nationally, building slowed because of the war effort and the scarcity of building materials for civilian purposes, new construction filled many of the previously undeveloped lots of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls. The wartime construction in the neighborhood illustrates the kind of housing that was given priority by FHA and the federal agencies responsible for allocating scarce building materials. Housing of this period was constructed for war workers and military families under the guidelines of the FHA and was designed to be affordable for families with modest incomes.

Long before the United States entered World War II following the Pearl Harbor attack in December 1941, the country was preparing for war. As defense industries geared up production the FHA began to explore its role in stimulating construction of housing for workers who were migrating to defense areas. In March 1940, FHA's recently retired Deputy Director, Miles L. Colean, published a report, Housing for Defense: A Review of the Role of Housing in Relation to America's Defense and a Program for Action under the auspices of the Twentieth Century Fund. It called for giving priority to construction of housing for rent or sale to defense workers with modest incomes. A year later, in March 1941, Congress amended the National Housing Act by adding Title VI, Defense Housing Insurance. This authorized FHA to insure private market construction of housing in designated defense areas for defense workers and over the course of four years Congress authorized a total of $1,800,000,000 for war housing insurance. The FHA lowered its requirements for economic soundness for privately funded defense housing construction in order to "cover the stripped-down house meeting WPB [War Production Board] standards and the location requirements of war housing in proximity to industrial plants," as described by FHA's Administrator.⁵⁶ War-era housing legislation and FHA rules implementing it incorporated proposals from Colean's report. FHA mortgage insurance was essentially limited to housing in designated defense areas. The Washington, D.C., area was designated a defense area on April 10, 1941. Single-family housing, to be eligible, had to cost less than $6,000 to buy or $50 per month to rent so that it would be within reach of war workers who were given priority as purchasers or renters.

The building boom that took place within Highland Park-Overlee Knolls between 1941 and 1944 reflects the stimulus that FHA and related wartime regulation of housing construction created for the construction of small, simple, low-cost housing using alternative, often new, construction materials. Virtually the entire section of Highland Park west of Ohio Street North is World War II-era housing. Most of the dwellings on the 6200 block of 19th Street North were constructed in 1941 by Lachlan C. MacPherson, a Scottish-born builder. John C. Wright built nine houses in 6200 block of 18th Street North and a number of other houses within Highland Park in 1941. Allen C. Minnix developed the 1400 and 1500 blocks of Potomac and Powhatan Streets North and the west side of the 1400 and 1500 Blocks of Ohio Street North in 1943 and 1944. Various other builders also constructed housing in the war years on previously unimproved streets and vacant lots in Highland Park and Overlee Knolls. FHA did not retain the records that would make it possible to determine whether these were FHA-insured properties. However, whether or not they were constructed with the benefit of FHA mortgage insurance, they would have had to conform to FHA requirements for defense area war worker housing in order to qualify for the War Production Board priorities that gave their builders access to building materials. In addition to the cost limitations, FHA also checked plans to ensure that builders made the minimum possible use of scarce materials. FHA encouraged the use of newly developed alternative building materials and construction techniques such as sheetrock/gypsum, asbestos siding, asphalt shingles, brick veneering, and concrete blocks. These materials and techniques make the war-time housing constructed in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls easily identifiable.

The housing constructed in the immediate post-World War II period in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls reflects the priorities of the FHA in the late 1940s and early 1950s when it implemented programs designed to meet the housing needs of returning veterans as they married and established families. No applications for the Title VI War Housing Insurance were accepted after September 1945 but essentially the same program was revived by Congress in May 1946 under the Veterans Emergency Housing Act with an authorization for $2 billion in mortgage insurance.

In Highland Park-Overlee Knolls the remaining few larger land parcels were subdivided in the years immediately after World War II. These included Richmond Hill Section 3 in 1946, Richmond Hill, Section 4 in 1947, Highland Park Village in 1947, and DiGiulian's Second Addition to Over Lee Ridge in 1950. Resubdivision also occurred in Highland Park and Overlee Knolls as vacant and expansive lots were divided to create smaller parcels. In general, the housing constructed in the post-war years was somewhat more spacious than the wartime housing, with two-story Colonial Revival-style houses predominating. Rising land prices tended to preclude the construction of low cost housing. An advertisement for new dwellings on Powhatan Street North in Overlee Knolls Section One described the subdivision as "Arlington's finest medium priced subdivision." The houses offered ranged in price from $13,500 to $22,500. The larger ones offered three bedrooms, a large living room with fireplace, a separate dining room, a large screened porch, and a built-in garage.⁵⁷

Overlee Knolls Section One, although platted in 1926, remained unimproved west of North Ohio Street between Washington Boulevard and 22nd Street North until after World War II. Thus it was ripe for more expensive and profitable development in the post-war years when a great variety of building materials again became available. The lots were large and the subdivision attracted speculative builders, most notably Lachlan C. MacPherson, one of the subdividers of Overlee Ridge, who had been a builder in Arlington since before World War II. These post-war houses, described as medium-priced, were in the $25,000 range and offered much more living space with such features as full dining rooms, dens, and screened porches along with three bedrooms. These houses, like many from this period in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, reflected the Colonial Revival style. A 1947 Washington Post article describing Arlington County's "hectic building pace" noted that the "two-story three bedroom home has been the favorite of Arlington builders" and that a survey of the scores of building projects in the County would show that, "at least 95 percent will be of the two-story brick style...." The article stated that, "The reason is simple. Such homes meet all zoning regulations. Financing is easier, customer acceptance has been favorable.... Ramblers are few and far between and nearly all are custom built." The article said that the average price for these houses was around $14,000 and that, "Since the two-story brick homes are essentially out of the same mold, prices vary little for the same product. Land cost and extra trimmings make up the difference."⁵⁸

Despite the perennial popularity of the two-story Colonial Revival-style brick-veneered house, some houses reflecting Modern Movement architecture were constructed in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls from the late 1940s onwards. Nationally, ranch houses, with their one-story, asymmetrical, horizontal facades, picture windows, and open floor plans, were gaining in popularity in the mid-twentieth century. In the post-World War II era some were built on still vacant lots, particularly in the Overlee Knolls sections. A more unusual form of modern house constructed in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls was known as the "California type," a term coined by the speculative builder. They are one-story square dwellings constructed of concrete block faced in stucco with pyramidal roofs. Like the ranch houses, they are interspersed among other building types and several were constructed in the post-war Richmond Hill subdivision. The three identified on 22nd Street North were built by John H. Gullett in 1948 and 1949 as speculative development. Gullett, a naval officer and lawyer, was inspired by the modern housing he studied while stationed in California during World War II. In 1953, he collaborated with architect Oscar Nordstrom in the design of his own home in Northwest Washington, D.C., experimenting further with the square forms and natural materials he produced for Highland Park-Overlee Knolls.⁵⁹

The Neighborhood of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls

Although the various subdivisions (including the additions and resubdivisions) in the Highland Park-Overlee Knolls neighborhood were separately conceived and developed by different developers and individual property owners, they have functioned as an amalgamated community since the platting of Fostoria in 1890. As the neighborhood began to expand, especially in the 1930s, residents were working together for their common interests. They formed a joint civic association – Highland Park-Overlee Knolls Civic Association – in the early 1930s that was successful in its campaign to have the County construct the Walter Reed Elementary School for the education of neighborhood children. The original four-room school building was enlarged in 1946, 1950, 1962, and again in 1967. In 1941, as the neighborhood was experiencing its greatest phase of growth and development, the Resurrection Evangelical Lutheran Church was constructed at 6201 Washington Boulevard. The original open-nave church was a modest structure that served a growing congregation, thus requiring it be extensively enlarged in 1958. One of the most inspiring Modern Movement buildings in Arlington County, the 1958 church utilizes common materials such as brick and concrete like the surrounding dwellings; however, the modern design introduces a tall stylized bell tower, banked windows with colored metal spandrels, pierced concrete screens with a floral pattern, and a cantilevered flat roof over the recessed entry along North Potomac Street. Modern Movement materials and designs also influenced the look of the new Westover Branch of the Arlington County Public Library. Opened in 1963, the library building was constructed by W. Bradley Tyree at 1800 North Lexington Street. The new library was strategically sited at the intersection of three neighborhoods – Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, Tara-Leeway Heights, and Leeway-Overlee – and within walking distance of Westover. This building was razed in 2010, when the library facilities were moved to the newly renovated Walter Reed Elementary School.

Unlike its surrounding neighborhoods of Arlington County, Highland Park-Overlee Knolls exhibits an array of architectural styles, forms, and materials popularized in the late nineteenth century through to the mid-twentieth century. The subdividers, builders, and developers who worked in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls took advantage of the guidelines and standards of the periods during which they developed their individual subdivisions, tailoring the buildings to meet the needs of the prospective owners and fashions of the day. They did not use covenants to achieve cohesiveness and profitability as many residential neighborhoods often implemented, but rather continually studied, employed, and refined the mandates, guidelines, and standards of the Better Homes and Small House Movement and FHA, which also continued to mature as homeowners' needs and desires changed, and events such as the arrival of the railroad/streetcar, the advent of the automobile, and the effects of the World Wars influenced architectural styles, construction methods, and building materials. Overwhelmingly owner-occupied since the platting of the first subdivision in 1890, Highland Park-Overlee Knolls epitomizes what the FHA and nationally recognized organizations promoted as “convenient, attractive and wholesome homes accessible to all American families.”

Verbal Boundary Description (Describe the boundaries of the property.)

The Highland Park-Overlee Knolls Historic District is located in the western portion of Arlington County. The north boundary is formed by the northern property line of those lots fronting on the north side of 22nd Street North. The eastern boundary of the district includes those properties on the west side of North Lexington Street to 16th Street North, where it turns southwest to meet North Longfellow Street. The properties fronting both sides of North Longfellow Street between 16th Street North and 18th Street North are included. The boundary includes those properties on the northwest side of McKinley Road, which is the continuation of 18th Street North southwest of North Longfellow Street. Excluding the commercial enclave on the east side of McKinley Road at its intersection with Washington Boulevard, the boundary travels southwest to include all those properties fronting McKinley Road to the north of Interstate 66. Interstate 66 serves as the southern boundary of the district from McKinley Road to North Quantico Street. North Quantico Street, including those properties on the east side of the street, serves as the western boundary from Interstate 66 to 22nd Street North.

The Highland Park-Overlee Knolls Historic District consists of eight subdivisions platted from 1890 to 1947: Fostoria (1890), Over-Lee Knolls (1926), Section Two Over-Lee Knolls (1927), Parkhurst (1938), Over Lee Ridge (1940), Richmond Hill Section Three (1946), Richmond Hill Section Four (1947), and Highland Park Village (1947). These subdivisions have collectively been known as Highland Park-Overlee Knolls since the mid-twentieth century. Accordingly, the historic district includes all of the land platted as part of these subdivisions. Four lots in the northeastern portion of the Fostoria subdivision were excluded because the lots were developed as part of Westover, a planned residential subdivision that was developed between 1939 and 1948 by Mace Properties and E. Ray Keene; neither Mace Properties nor E. Ray Keene were responsible for development in Highland Park-Overlee Knolls. These lots are the site of the Westover Shopping Center, a commercial enclave that, although an essential component of the Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, were constructed by Mace Properties between 1940 and 1950. The Westover Shopping Center is located in the Westover National Register Historic District.

Boundary Justification (Explain why the boundaries were selected.)

The northern boundary, following the property line of those buildings on the north side of 22nd Street North between North Quantico Street and North Madison Street, is the northern borders of the Over-Lee Knolls and Section Two Over-Lee Knolls subdivisions. These two large subdivisions, which make up most of the northern half of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls, were platted by the Arlington Properties Corporation in 1926-1927 on property owned from the mid-1800s to the mid-1920s by Henry Wand Febrey and his descendents. To the east of North Madison Street to its intersection with North Lexington Street, the northern boundary follows the northern border of the Richmond Hill subdivision, which was owned and platted by J.C. Thompson in 1946-1947. This property is believed to have also been a portion of the Febrey property. Improvements along this block are contemporaneous with those on neighboring blocks in the Over-Lee Knolls subdivisions, which developed largely between 1925 and 1950.

The eastern boundary, roughly following North Lexington Street, 16th Street North and McKinley Road, is created by the subdivisions of Richmond Hill, Parkhurst, Highland Park Village, and Fostoria. These subdivisions abut the neighborhoods of Westover and Tara-Leeway Heights, which were platted and developed by different developers than those establishing the subdivisions of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls. Despite being platted at different times, the subdivisions developed contemporaneously under the direction of many of the same builders and architects.

The southern boundary follows Interstate 66, the only major highway running west from Washington, D.C. into Northern Virginia. Interstate 66 was created 1961 along the former route of the Washington and Old Dominion Railroad. The railroad line, established in 1891, was the southernmost border of the Fostoria subdivision, which makes up the southern portion of the Highland Park-Overlee Knolls neighborhood. This section of the neighborhood includes the area's oldest extant residential buildings, which often stand alongside mid-twentieth-century dwellings.

The western boundary, including those properties on the east side of North Quantico Street, is the westernmost borders of the subdivisions of Fostoria, Over Lee Ridge, and Over-Lee Knolls. These subdivisions abut the neighborhood of Arlington-East Falls Church, which has a separate development history. Further, North Quantico Street is wider than the interior streets of Highland Park-Overlee Knolls (with the exception of Washington Boulevard) and, like Interstate 66, acts as a visual barrier between the historic district and Arlington-East Falls Church neighborhood.
